THE ANTICIPATED RIOT.

Failure of the Ring to Create a Disturbance Among the Laborers—No Meeting Held at Central Park.

The attempt of the Ring, through the incendiary organ, to incite a riotous attack upon the Mayor and persons of those citizens who have dared to speak out boldly in denunciation of its corruption, and to be foremost in its suppression, has proved a signal failure. The meeting of laborers which was called by the Forger's journal, at the instigation of the Ring, and afterward by advertisement, did not take place last night on the corner of Fifty-ninth-street and Eighth-avenue, as was expected. When our reporter visited the place designated for the meeting, there was no sign of excitement, everything wearing its usual aspect. Except the fruit-stand proprietors, and Park coachmen on the corner, there were few persons to be seen about the place at the Park entrance. Being a Park policeman in company with another individual crossing the place, upon inquiring of them, the reporter was informed that they had understood that there was to be no meeting; that it was a failure, or had been postponed, they did not know which. At Fifty-eighth-street and Eighth-avenue a small body of laborers had gathered together in front of the liquor-saloons on each corner, and were laughing and passing jokes between themselves, the only excitement apparent being shown by a large number of reporters who were hurrying hither and thither in search of information. The arrival of a car-load of policemen created a sensation for a few minutes, but these being no need of their services they soon vanished from view. Moving among the laborers, our reporter learned that many of those who had visited the neighborhood during the night were drawn there from curiosity, the whole thing being put down as the humbug sensation of a Ring paper that wanted to get up a riot. The paper that published the proclamation was in several instances strongly denounced and stigmatized as no friend of the laborers.

The relative merits of the Ring and the Committee of Seventy were discussed, and the friends of the latter had but little difficulty in making their opponents concede to them the best of the argument.

One of the laborers, speaking of Mr. GREEN when he was Comptroller of the Central Park, said that he did not employ as many men as HILTON. "Sure, he had all that was needed," said another, "and that's three enough, and ye can't deny it." Remarks complimentary to politicians of all kinds and parties, were handled, and the Ring came in for the largest share of abuse. One of the laborers said that the Park men had got all their pay, but it was the men on the work that were the worst off, they having as their last pay day six weeks due them. "But," said another, "they always hold two weeks' pay back."

"Sure it aint so bad, after all," chimed in another; "It's the papers that's making all the fuss. You can't believe all you see in the papers, some or thim, anyhow."

"The Star is making all the talk, and I guess it gets well paid for doing it. You know it well enough yourself, only you are ashamed to own it, owing it's of your party," said one, to the previous speaker.

Meeting of Laborers at Rupert's Hall—Remarks by a Park Gardener—The Politics Not Needed.

Some of the laborers assembled at Rupert's Hall, in Fifty-third-street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues. Mr. JAMES REILLY presided. He briefly addressed the audience, which consisted of about 200 people, principally of the working class. He said if it were found that there were unworthy men in the Democratic Party—men who sacrificed the good of the working man to their own base and selfish motives—they should be repudiated by all means. If their characters were not fit to bear the closest scrutiny they should be left in oblivion. The majority of working men who kept their heads clear, so far from being desirous of propagating riot, were in favor of law and order. If the grievous wrongs charged against them had been committed by men in the Democratic ranks, it was their duty to remove them. [Applause.] To his knowledge the working men had removed mountains. Why not remove miserable pigmy politicians. He didn't care whether he was discharged from the public works or not, for, as long as he had a strong arm to work out a living in another field, he could not be deprived of the privilege of speaking out his views as an American citizen. In conclusion, he read the following preamble and resolution, which were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The men employed in the public parks and other public works are threatened with being discharged, owing to the difficulties in the financial department of our City Government, and whether said difficulties be real or imaginary, if they cause the work to be suspended, we, the working men, will be the real sufferers instead of the criminals, if there be such, who have brought such disgrace on the great Democratic Party of our State and County, and so much misery and distress on the toiling thousands of our City; and,

Whereas, Even in view of the economy and the interest of property-holders, the stoppage of work partly finished, would at some future time necessitate its renewal, and the money already spent on said works would only be adding hence to the mountains of losses attributed to the cupidity of our City officials; therefore, in view of such facts, and setting aside the interest that should be always taken in the encouragement of honest toil, we hope the laboring men of New-York will not be forced to suffer for crimes that they were innocent of, and had no hand in committing; and we further hope if there be any of our City officials found guilty of the alleged charges the dignity and justice of the law will be vindicated, and that in this great land no station will be so exalted as to secure them from the penalties of crimes when committed, as the working men of New-York are determined to rebuke those who are found guilty of the Commonwealth; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the working men of New-York are not humable to the duty we owe to our common country, and as history unerringly points to the happiness, peace and plenty of former times under Democratic rule, we can enjoy the same blessings again by rebuking crime and injustice, whether in Democrats or Republicans, and rewarding virtue, if the opportunity be visited in us.

Views of Mr. Foley—The Instigator of the "Warning."

At about 9 o'clock, a reporter visited Mr. JOHN FOLEY, at his residence, No. 20 East Seventy-third-street. The servant exercised considerable precaution in admitting him, but on his explanation that he represented the TIMES he was ushered into the presence of Mr. FOLEY, who appeared anything but alarmed at the prospect of an attack upon his house. "Why, I announced my intention of going over there to make a speech," said he, "but my friends dissuaded me. The laborers have too much sense to attack me. They must know that I have been working in their interest. My wife and children were somewhat alarmed at first, but they have got bravely over that. I have had any quantity of invitations today from my friends to pass the evening with them, but I feel as secure at home as I would be anywhere. There is no use of these Tammany thieves attempting to incite trouble; they have been thoroughly shown up, and it is futile for them to undertake to shield themselves in this way." Mrs. FOLEY, who was present, manifested but little fear of any difficulty. "Any way," said she, "I'll be glad when it is well over."

Mr. FOLEY called at Judge HILTON's office, yesterday, to discover, if possible, what the learned Judge's laborers proposed doing. Mr. HILTON was absent, but HOWLAND, the "Star Proclamationist," was in attendance. "I have been informed by ROSSER R. ROOSEVELT," remarked Mr. FOLEY to the TIMES reporter, "that SWEENY was at the bottom of that celebrated 'warning,' and that he is responsible for it."

At the Twenty-third Precinct the reporter was informed by Capt. OLINDY that he had no fears whatever of any trouble, and that he had no extra men in attendance.

The Police Arrangements.

The Police Department, though not apprehensive of any considerable disturbance of the peace by the laborers, yesterday, were prepared for an emergency, and Superintendent KELSO had the whole force kept in reserve. Three hundred men were specially detailed to prevent anything of a riotous character. One hundred men under Capt. WARD, of the Twenty-second Precinct, were sent to guard the place at Fifty-ninth-street, and a like number for each point were send to guard the neighborhood of the residences of Mr. GEORGE JONES and Mr. JOHN FOLEY. They had a full time of it, the laborers making no demonstration in either locality, they being sufficiently intelligent to discriminate between friends and foes.

THE TAX LEVY.

Meeting of the Board of Supervisors—The Tax Levy Confirmed—A Little Speech From the Mayor.

The Board of Supervisors met at noon yesterday, nearly all the members being present, Mayor HALL occupying the chair.

As soon as the Board had been called to order the Mayor said that he would claim the indulgence of the members of the Press for a few moments to say that, as if by a concert of misrepresentation, the newspapers, almost without an exception, had announced that the Supervisors would meet to make arrangements to pay off the City laborers, and to settle other current expenses. The Sinking Fund Commissioners, according to the same authorities, were to meet for the same purpose. Now the Supervisors' intended meeting of Friday and their meeting of today had nothing to do with the payment of any claims whatever, except in so far as this might be included in the raising of taxes for the current year, which taxes had, however, already been anticipated by the issue of revenue bonds. As for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, they had as much to do with raising money to pay laborers and the salaries of employes of the City and County Government as the distinguished gentlemen who sat at the reporters' table.

Mr. HART moved that the report of the Committee on Annual Taxes be taken up, and the clerk read the usual form of ordinance, providing for the levying of taxes for the year, amounting to $23,523,527 62.

The ordinance was adopted unanimously, and the Board adjourned.

The excess of State tax for 1871 over that of 1870 is $1,237,454 96. To provide for this State tax an additional rate of a fraction more than seventeen one-hundredths of the per cent. upon the total valuation alone is required, making the whole rate of taxation on the real and personal estate which is subject to taxation for 1871, say two and seventeen one-hundredths of one per cent., the total amount of tax thus produced being $23,523,527 62.

It is expected that the books for personal taxes and banking institutions will be opened for payment by Wednesday next, and the receiver will give notice of the same.

The valuation of the real and personal estate subject to taxation in the City and County of New-York, is exhibited in detail by the following statement:

The City Finances—Action of Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN, the Deputy Controller, has been very active for several days past in his efforts to secure prompt action of the Board of Apportionment, the Board of Supervisors and the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, in order to obtain the requisite power and authority to raise money to meet the urgent demands upon the Treasury, of the various departments of the City Government, to pay laboring men and others. Any delay in the meeting of these bodies, without which money cannot be had, is certainly not the fault of Mr. GREEN, and he hopes and believes that they will be got together early next week.

The Board of Supervisors have met and confirmed the Tax Levy, so that no unusual delay will occur in the collection of the taxes, but, without the meeting of the other Boards, money, independent of the taxes, cannot be had.

The public may rest assured, however, that every effort will be made by the Deputy Controller to effect the object desired, and when the settlement of the injunction order in the Foley case has been made, it is expected that great facilities will be afforded for starting the financial wheels anew.

The Sinking Fund Commissioners and the Apportionment Board to Meet.

The Board for the revision and Correction of Assessments will meet at 3½ P. M. on Monday next, in the Controller's office, when a number of Assessments for important works will be confirmed.

Shortly after the Supervisors had adjourned yesterday the Mayor announced that the Board of Apportionment will meet on Wednesday next, and the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund on Monday. This would involve, he said, the necessity of three politicians staying away from the Rochester Convention.

Paying Laborers, &c.

The Clerk of Arrears, A. S. CADY, paid 600 laborers on Friday, and about the same number on Saturday, thus completing the settlement of claims of this character for the present. Yesterday notices were posted in the auditing bureaus of the Finance Department, stating that "no payments will be made today." Usually the warrants for salaries are given out on the last day of the month, but it was well understood beforehand that none would be forthcoming yesterday, and consequently no applications were made for them.

The Policemen's Pay.

Treasurer BARR, of the Police Board, announced yesterday that he had no money with which to pay the Police salaries for the month of September, but that he expected to get it on Monday. The amount required is $275,000, and he did not indicate the source from which he expected to obtain this large sum. Heretofore payments of salaries have always been promptly made on the first or second day of the month, and the short delay which must now occur will probably subject the Police to some little inconvenience.

The Injunction Order.

In relation to the order of injunction against the City, Judge BARNARD stated yesterday that the three proposed orders submitted to him by counsel on both sides he had returned, with a view to ascertain if they could agree on some definite form of order. They were to have been returned to him at noon yesterday, and on Monday, he said, he would settle and enter the order.

TAMMANY'S FRIENDS AND FOES.

The election of delegates for the Democratic State Convention came off last evening, and tamer affairs have been seldom witnessed. The rendezvous were generally the low groceries and liquor-shops in each district. An air of despondency was clearly traceable on the faces of those present, which even copious libations could not drive away. Well-dressed Tammanyites, resplendent with diamonds, were prominent at each gathering, mingled with the rougher-looking set usually to be met with around liquor-stores. The elections, nevertheless, were conducted in an orderly manner, which may be attributed to the fact that in every case the bejeweled individuals have the whole business prearranged, cut and dry.

The question as to the chances of the delegation obtaining seats in the Convention was much discussed, and while many gave expression to the opinion that the County Democracy would not dare to array itself in opposition to Tammany, not a few took a different view, and despondingly admitted that in point of character and ability the Reform Democracy delegates could not be excelled, and would most likely be admitted to the Convention as the representatives of the genuine Democracy of New-York.

The following is the list of the delegates elected:

Dist.	Delegates.	Alternates.
1.	John R. Fellows.	Nicholas Miller.
2.	Thomas Coman.	Patrick Lysaght.

Passengers on the Erie Railroad were last year put under great intimidation by the army of roughs on their way to the Democratic Convention at Rochester, at the expense of Tammany, who paid for their tickets. People were assaulted, pockets picked, watches stolen, and there was altogether a complete carnival of crime and rowdyism. On the return of the thieves and ruffians to New-York, a large number of them were arrested by the New-Jersey authorities in Jersey City, and suffered the punishment due to their depredations. The enactment of the same scenes is imminent this year. The Tammany Ring have already secured passages for 500 of the same class of rowdies to go to Rochester to carry the Convention in their behalf. The Jersey authorities will, no doubt, be fully prepared for them.

The Nineteenth Ward Anti-Tammany Democrats.

The Democratic Reform Association of the Nineteenth Ward—Anti-Tammany—met last night at the First National Club-house, No. 359 Third-avenue, R. B. RUDD, President, in the chair. Speeches were made declaring war to the bitter end against Tammany.

Trades Union Delegates—Tammany Denounced—The Committee of Seventy Indorsed.

At a meeting of the Trades Union delegates last evening, Mr. ELLIOTT spoke in favor of cutting loose from the existing political parties and of having a platform and a ticket of their own. He denounced the political corruption of the City authorities, and indorsed the action of the Committee of Seventy. He moved that a Committee of Trades be appointed to arrange for a mass-meeting to nominate suitable candidates. After some discussion, the motion was postponed.

Tammany Minions Disturbing a Working Men's Meeting.

At a meeting of the Ninth Ward Working Men's Mutual Protective Association, held on Friday evening, the Secretary, JOSHUA ROSS, made a lengthy exposition of the objects of the Association, and referring to the policy of supporting public office-holders who profess to represent the working classes, read a letter from Senator MICHAEL NORTON, upon which he animadverted in severe terms.

ARTHUR DELANY, Ex-Assemblyman, fully indorsed all that Mr. ROSS had said, and spoke about corruption and frauds of the civic authorities.

Ex-Assemblyman MITCHELL followed in the same strain.

Mr. BROWNING, of the Working Men's Union, and President of the Bricklayers' Union, claimed the right for some of his friends present to address the meeting, whereupon Ex-Assemblyman BERGEN, and Mr. CONNOLLY, of the Painters' Trades-union, attempted to make a defence of Tammany Hall, but were interrupted by Mr. ROSS telling them they were out of order. A scene of the utmost excitement here ensued, which lasted until near midnight, a general mêlée threatening at one time. The Tammanyites would not leave the room, and so the gas was turned down amid considerable excitement.

The Ring as Convicts.

The last issue of a certain weekly pictorial paper, printed in this City, contained a large cut representing HALL, TWEED, SWEENY and CONNOLLY in convict dress and heavily manacled. Underneath this picture were the legends, "The Tammany Ring, as the people propose to have it," "What they are going to do about it." This illustration seems to have startled the Mayor from his propriety, as yesterday he sent for Police Capt. THORNS and peremptorily ordered him to notify all newsmen that they must not expose this paper for sale. The exasperated Mayor also directed that the stands of all newsmen refusing to obey this decree should be removed. The order only applied to the dealers having stands on the sidewalks, for which they must have permits from the Mayor, and designated that if the offence of selling the obnoxious paper was committed on or after Monday next, the permits would be revoked and the stands removed. These orders will be executed by Capt. THORNS, but as the Mayor cannot reach the book and periodical stores the objectionable paper which the Mayor has taken such pains to advertise has not been killed.

The Voucher Thieves Fully Committed.

In the newspaper reports of the conclusion of the proceedings in the case of HAGERTY and BAULCH it was not stated that the prisoners were fully committed without bail. Such is the case.

Ex-Mayor Havemeyer's Suits Against the Ring Officials and Contractors.

It is positively asserted that the processes in the civil suits of Hon. WILLIAM HAVEMEYER against several of the City's plunderers, for the recovery of the stolen treasure, have been served upon Mr. HALL, Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, and J. H. INGERSOLL, the great carpet and furniture dealer. The gentlemen who have the management of the case of the plaintiff in the suits are very circumspect and reticent and refuse to give any information whatever. It however seems to be pretty well authenticated that a process was served upon INGERSOLL at his office, No. 71 Bowery, Friday forenoon, and the rumor that the rest of the plundering coterie have decamped, gains credence from the fact that every effort, so far, to ascertain their whereabouts has proved futile. Judge BARNARD, on the application of Ex-Judge BARRETT, W. H. PECKHAM, Gen. BARLOW and A. R. LAWRENCE, counsel to the Committee of Seventy, has issued his summons for certain persons to appear before him with their books and accounts for examination. Similar summonses were issued yesterday, among which were the names of Ingersoll, J. W. Smith, Garvey, Miller, New-York Printing Company, and others of the same ilk. The examination is intended to compel these persons to show what services they rendered for the money received. To-morrow, it is said, that the public will receive information of a more startling character than the above, and it is to be hoped that the assertion may be realized. It is also said that the nature of the process in view will not be of a civil character, but will assume the form of a criminal prosecution. Gentlemen of the law, who have charge of the matter, state that there have been many difficulties encountered toward securing the ends of justice, but as they have finally, with herculean labor, been removed, the path is now considered clear for them to arrest the guilty parties.

Popular Address from the Reform Party.

To the Citizens of New-York:

The regular Democratic organization that inaugurated last Fall the fight against Tammany Hall and the corrupt Ring which controls it, whose candidate for Mayor received the support of over 45,000 voters of this City, according to the official Ring count, again unfurls its banner of political reform, and invites the co-operation and influence of all who are sincerely opposed to fraud and corruption, and in favor of the proper reform of our Municipal Government. All that was then charged against the infamous oligarchy that rules our City has since been verified and proven beyond the possibility of a doubt. The most sceptical must now see and realize the necessity for an earnest and determined effort to break down the bulwarks of official dishonesty, and to drive the bold bad men who have plundered and disgraced us from power and place. Never before, in the history of our trials, has such a favorable and auspicious opportunity presented itself as the present time affords to free ourselves and our City from the grasp of brutal power and insolent nefarity. The honest men of all parties and organizations are alive to the importance of speedy and decisive action. The Regular Democratic Organization confidently and proudly refers to its record of last year, when it alone stood firm against the combined influences of the patronage, wealth, and unscrupulous appliances of the Ring, and although defeated by villainy and cunning, came out of the fight unsullied and undeterred. In again asking the support and co-operation of all who are in favor of true reform, and putting only honest and capable men on duty, we promise that our efforts shall be unceasing to rid our City of the thieves and plunderers who now hold high revel in our Municipal Government, to make no compromise with the enemies of the people, with the outlaws who have disgraced us, and who now, with shameless hardihood, pretend to defy and spurn the aroused indignation of an oppressed community, while really they are quaking before the ominous uprising that is not only to hurl them from power, but to bring them to punishment and disgrace. We are about to receive the reward of our persistent efforts against the vilest profligacy and corruption that the political history of the world affords, and we call upon all who have the welfare and prosperity of our City at heart, to join in the grand movement for reform and good government. "Down with the Ring." "No more repeating and false counting." "No more swindling and stealing." "Down with SWEENY, TWEED, CONNOLLY and HALL and their Ring allies." Honesty, incorruptibility and character must be the future tests of political preferment.

Frenchmen Denouncing the Thieves.

A meeting was held last night at the corner of Twenty-second-street and Seventh-avenue, by the Fourteenth Ward French Democrats of this City. M. E. A. LEGRAND, President of the Society, addressed the meeting, appealing to Frenchmen to help to select gentlemen of integrity and ability for the election this Fall.

WHAT THE PEOPLE SAY.

A Comparison.

You have no idea what anxiety awaits the evening mail here to get the NEW-YORK TIMES. The gallant and stubborn fight you have made against the corrupt Tammany Ring, excites the praise and admiration of all parties. The weight, as also the envious state of the Tribune and the Herald, all along during the fight, have only added to the credit of the TIMES. And now, today, the TIMES is the first paper, not only of the City, but of the continent. In looking over the Herald of nowadays, how contemptible and wishy-washy we find its editorials! Its editorial corps seems now to be demented, or to have softening of the brain, and to write only for Houston and Crosby streets and the Five Points.

It is to be regretted that the Tribune, a paper that wields so great a power throughout the North and West, has not put forth its power in this fight. With all it can do, it leaves only the impression that it is hampered more or less in the toils of Tammany. J. C. M.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Sept. 27, 1871.

Hilton's Humbugs.

Judge HILTON's engineer's report asserts that it will be a great loss to stop work on the parks, among them the so-called Jackson and Grand-street Parks. A few men commenced work on the so-called Jackson Park last Friday, and not $25 has yet been laid out on Jackson-square. The same will hold good as regards Grand-street-square. His assertion is false that loss will arise from stoppage on these works; on the contrary, it will be a saving to the City in labor to clear the frost and snow in Winter in hard weather, so the mechanics can work.

In addition, the adjoining property-holders were assessed a few years ago to pave these very squares with Belgian pavement. Interested parties should get out injunctions to prevent these so-called new squares, which will only give employment to superfluous labor. C. H.

NEW-YORK, Friday, Sept. 29, 1871.

More Hints for the Seventy.

It is a well-known fact that there are many gin-mills and lager-beer saloons in the City that are furnished with taxis, some one and some two, at the expense of the City. This is one of the means by which Tammany has suborned its supporters. There is one of the newest pattern of lamps opposite No. 66 Greenwich-avenue. Cannot a Committee of the Seventy, by applying at the Gas Company's Office, ascertain just where these Tammany lights are and squelch them? NOW.

THE BIG JUDGE AT BAY.

A Warrant to Issue for His Arrest on a Charge of Larceny.

It is stated on good authority that yesterday afternoon a warrant was issued by Justice COULTER for the arrest of MICHAEL CONNOLLY, the "Big Judge," on a charge of larceny from the person preferred by M. J. A. MCCAFFERY, Esq. The circumstances of the case are as follows: Mr. MCCAFFERY is a lawyer having an office at No. 60 Nassau-street, and does business for Mr. TERRENCE FARLEY in the way of drawing papers and conducting his litigations, &c. He has a partner in business by the name of KERNAN. Messrs. MCCAFFERY & KERNAN, having considerable searching of titles, &c., to do, commenced some time ago the preparation of a book in which should be recorded descriptions and searches of all property or mortgages in which Mr. TERRENCE FARLEY was in any way a party, and for the purpose of having the papers accurately prepared, employed Mr. JOHN L. FITZGERALD, formerly FITZGERALD & MCGUIRE, No. 207 Fulton-street, Brooklyn, to examine the searches after they were made, and see that they were in every respect correct and regular. Blank forms were prepared on which the returns were to be made, and Mr. FITZGERALD proceeded with his labor some weeks ago, and had very nearly completed it when an occurrence took place which put a temporary end to the searches. Mr. FITZGERALD was employing, as a helper in the searches, Mr. JAMES J. MURPHY, who, without the previous knowledge of Mr. FITZGERALD, was engaged as a searcher in the office of the Register of New-York County.

On the 27th inst. Mr. MCCAFFERY gave Mr. FITZGERALD about 200 of the slips containing the records of searches, and he proceeded to the New-York Register's office for the purpose of verifying them. While examining the books, a son-in-law of MICHAEL CONNOLLY, (who also happens to bear the name of CONNOLLY,) the "Big Judge" and the Register, observed something about the papers which attracted his attention, and he forthwith hastened to his father-in-law with the information. The "Big Judge" rolled out of his private office and rolling up to Mr. FITZGERALD seized the papers that were lying upon the desk, and at once hurried into his private room, again regardless of the protests of Mr. FITZGERALD and his demand for the return of the documents. At the same time of seizing the papers, CONNOLLY, (the "Big Judge,") turning to Mr. MURPHY, notified him that he was discharged from his (the Register's) service. This was the first intimation Mr. FITZGERALD had that Mr. MURPHY was in the employ of the Register. Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. MURPHY at once reported the facts to Mr. MCCAFFERY, who went to the Register, whom he well knew, for the purpose of having MURPHY reinstated and also to procure the restoration of the papers. The "Big Judge" refused to vindicate MURPHY, and with reference to the papers, delivered himself of the following opinion: "The interpreters of the TIMES have been jarring around here for some time to get the real estate reports to show the Ring operations, and I won't have it." Mr. MCCAFFERY said in reply that he was not collecting the information for the TIMES, but that he had an undoubted right to get the facts he was searching for. He then made a formal demand for the papers again, when CONNOLLY said, "You can't have them; I have burned them." Mr. MCCAFFERY then indignantly rose from his seat, and assured the "Big Judge" that he would take him on another tack. As he was leaving the office, he met the son-in-law, and imparted to him an expression of his opinion of his conduct. Mr. MCCAFFERY then went before Judge HOGAN at the Tombs to make complaint against the "Big Judge" for the larceny of the papers, and to obtain a search-warrant for their recovery. Judge HOGAN replied that, as Mr. MCCAFFERY resided in Harlem, it was necessary that he should go before a Magistrate in that district. Accordingly Mr. MCCAFFERY proceeded to Justice MCQUADE and stated the facts. The Justice said he would consider the matter, and gave the claimant an answer the next morning. In order that the Judge might have an opportunity of thoroughly pondering over the momentous question, Mr. MCCAFFERY waited until the morning of Friday, when Justice MCQUADE informed him that he would not grant the warrant. Mr. MCCAFFERY then requested his partner, Mr. KERNAN, who resides at Fordham, to go before Justice COULTER, holding Court in Fifty-seventh-street near Third-avenue, and make complaint, as he, being a non-resident, could have a complaint entertained by any Justice. Judge COULTER issued a search-warrant, and placed it in the hands of Sergt. PHILLIPS, of the Court squad, for execution. The Sergeant went to the Registrar's private office and searched all the drawers and desks, but failed to find the papers, and accordingly made that return on the warrant about 3 P. M. on Friday. Mr. MCCAFFERY then made an affidavit charging the "Big Judge" with robbery, and Justice COULTER said that he would issue the warrant, and did issue it yesterday.

As Mr. MCCAFFERY was leaving the Court-room, NATHAN MURPHY, a friend of the "Big Judge," approached him and stated if he would get the papers back. Mr. MCCAFFERY replied that he would not listen to any compromise, but that he would take the papers whenever and wherever he could get them; he would not, however, compound a felony. NEPHEW then said that the papers should be returned to the Comptroller on Monday morning. It is said that CONNOLLY told Mr. FARLEY, on Friday, that the papers were in his (CONNOLLY'S) private desk, and this, too, notwithstanding his previous statement that they had been burned. CONNOLLY told Mr. MCCAFFERY that he would not allow any person, not a lawyer, to search the records of his office, though the law demands that the records of the Register's office shall be open to any citizen who wishes to examine them. It is said that CONNOLLY'S course was dictated by a wish to get on the right side of "Boss" TWEED, from whom he expects a renomination for Register. The fact that Mr. MCCAFFERY did not give the job of preparing the records to one of CONNOLLY'S employes may also have influenced his action in the matter. Mr. MCCAFFERY promises to vigorously push the complaint for robbery, and then to sue the "Big Judge" in a civil suit for damages.

Secretary BOUTWELL visited the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce on Thursday morning and made a brief address to the merchants assembled, from which we quote:

"To your kind attention, Mr. President, to the influence which I may have in the office I hold in the Government upon the business affairs of the country, I only wish to say this, that it is my purpose, so far as I may have the power, to aid the country in the restoration of its business and finances to a financial basis, without violent shock to the business or industry of the country. In looking to the future we cannot be insensible or indifferent to the fact that the relations in a business point of view of different parts of this great nation must be more intimate and dependent upon each other. The only other great barrier which ever existed since the formation of the Government to the most cordial social, political and business relations has been broken down. Some of the consequential evils that still appear to be difficulties remain; but gradually they will disappear, and we shall then see, in our own time, a country harmonious in all its parts, struggling for local, but still for general development of all its resources. I do not care to trouble you today with even more than a reference to one of the means which will contribute to this great end. We have our vast system of rivers and of lakes, furnishing such natural means of intercommunication as I believe are possessed by no other country on the habitable globe; and during the last forty years we have introduced and developed a great system of railways. I do not anticipate that these railways are ever to become a complete substitute for the means of intercommunication furnished by nature; but such is the adaptation of this system to the wants and business of a commercial country, that they can be introduced now without much reference to valleys, plains, or mountains. I think, having proper reference to the rights and interests of those who have invested their capital in these great undertakings, there is a great public right which should be affirmed and made express through law, by which this vast system shall be made subordinate to the business industries of the country. This done, the West will be vastly enriched by the opening of new markets for their products, not only upon the Atlantic coast, but across the great oceans—the Atlantic on the one hand and the Pacific on the other. The people of Europe who desire cheap meat and cheap bread will be benefited by every reduction in the cost of railway transportation between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. I do not think it will be necessary to exert the power of the country violently to accomplish this, but I think it should be understood that the business affairs of the country, the laboring affairs of the country, are to be directed to the perfection of this great system of internal communication between the different parts of the nation, and the cheapening of transportation just as fast and so far as it can be done with reference to the just rights of those who have invested their capital in those undertakings."

THE WEATHER.

Synopsis of Events and Probabilities.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30, 7 P. M.—The area of the highest barometer which was on Tuesday afternoon over Tennessee and Indiana, now extends from Ohio and Tennessee to the South Atlantic coast, having moved south eastward, with a very high pressure during the night. The barometer has risen decidedly from Maine to Florida. It has fallen north and west of the Ohio Valley as well as in Texas and Louisiana. Brisk northwest winds have continued in Florida and have veered to the east on the Texas coast, with increasing cloudy and threatening weather. A steady north-east gale has probably prevailed in the central portions of the Gulf. Hazy and pleasant weather has continued on the Lakes, with south and south-west winds this afternoon from Wisconsin to Kansas. The pressure has risen rapidly at the Rocky Mountain and California stations.

PROBABILITIES.

The barometer will probably continue high, but fall on Sunday over the Atlantic States, and fall on the Lakes, with increasing easterly winds. Cloudy and threatening weather will probably extend over the North-west and Upper Lakes, and continue in Florida and Texas.

A policeman was shot by some unknown person. Great excitement prevails. The stores are closed, and the people have been ordered to their homes.

TWO SIDES OF THE SAME STORY.

HIS SIDE.

A telegram, announcing the serious illness of my only sister, had shortened my hardly-earned holiday. Though I started from the North immediately by the night mail, London would not be reached before the next morning. With the prospect of a long and cold journey, I provided plenty of rugs and furs, and rolling myself up warmly in them, hoped to be able to allay my anxiety in sleep.

It was a bitter night in the beginning of December. Snow had been falling slightly during the day, and the country through which we hurried looked bleak and dismal. Spite of the weather, there appeared to be a good many passengers, and I was just congratulating myself in having secured an empty carriage, when, at a small country station, to my great disgust, the door was opened and a lady got in. Before I could remonstrate the door was shut, and the train again on the move.

"Confound that guard!" I mentally ejaculated; "what a lot of cold the fellow has let in!" and I proceeded to wrap my tiger-skin more tightly around me. In doing so, however, I found the unwelcome intruder had her feet on one end of it. The girl, for so I judged her to be from the slightness of her figure, moved instantly, and I caught a glimpse of her face. It was enough! The utter wretchedness, pallor, and wobegone look arrested my hand; and noticing that she had only a small bag with her, instead of taking care of myself, I begged her to accept the loan of my rug, remarking at the same time that it was "a frightfully cold night for traveling." The girl looked up, and smiling her thanks accepted my offer, but sank again in a dejected attitude into her corner of the carriage.

Somehow I could not settle to sleep. In vain I shut my eyes; some strange attraction caused me to open them, and look toward my companion. She was now leaning forward, gazing into the darkness with an anxious questioning look upon her face—a look as though she were striving to see into futurity—painful to behold in one so young.

Seen in the dim light given by the lamp, I judged her to be about twenty years of age—a refined, fragile-looking girl, far too delicate to be abroad alone such a night. From her face my glance descended to her dress, which was handsome, and in very good taste; she had taken off her gloves, and her small well-formed hands were clasped tightly together on her lap. That she was laboring under some deep distress or anxiety of mind, there could be no doubt.

Was it not strange for so young and pretty a girl to be traveling alone at such an hour? I had looked at my watch when she got into the carriage, and it marked midnight. No one had accompanied her to the door, not even a servant! Who was she? Where could she be going? Would she be met? Losing myself in these conjectures, I fell asleep.

The first cold gray rays of dawn were struggling into the carriage when I awoke, making the chilly air still more chill. I glanced at my companion; she looked positively death-like, but as wide awake as ever. As we were alone to London, I began to prepare my things for leaving the train. The girl returned my tiger-skin, and thanked me for it in a low voice. I made a few observations on the wretchedness of being obliged to travel all night, to which she barely responded. As I wanted to find out something about her, I went on talking; I told her I was hurrying home to my sister's sick bed, but concluded with,

"It will be too early, however, to knock them up when we reach town; so I shall go first and get some breakfast at a coffee-house where I am known, which is sure to be open."

"Is it a place a lady can go to?" to my surprise asked my companion; "because, if so, I shall be very glad of some coffee before I continue my journey."

"If you will permit me, I shall be very happy to take you there," I answered, "and also see after your luggage, as you are not going to be met."

"Thank you," she replied, while a vivid blush crossed her pale face; "but I have only this bag with me."

On reaching London I transferred my traps into a cab, and we started together in search of breakfast. Very soon we were comfortably located beside a blazing fire, with steaming hot coffee and eatables before us. My companion ate but little, and spoke still less.

"How pretty she is," I thought, and how entirely the lady. Still there is something so strange about the whole affair that I will make a mental note of everything about her—hazel eyes and hair; arched eyebrows, well-defined; largeness; pretty mouth; beautiful teeth; oval face." But I felt all the time, without thus minutely analyzing each feature, her place was indelibly impressed on my mind; I was not likely soon to forget either the face or the girl.

Being very anxious for news of my sister, directly our meal was finished I paid my bill—the girl would not hear of my paying her share—and ordered the waiter to call a hansom.

"Please, a cab for me at the same time," said she.

"Now," I thought, "she will be obliged to give an address, and I shall know where she is going."

Placing her in the cab, and shutting the door, I said, "Where shall I tell the driver to take you?"

A suddenly frightened look, a blush and catching of the breath, a moment's hesitation, and then "Temple-bar" was the order given. I marveled, but gave the direction, took off my hat, and the cab drove off. "Very mysterious," I thought. However, there was no time for indulging in vain speculation, home I must hasten. My sister I found very ill, though all danger was over; but what with the necessary attention to her, and a great press of business of my own, I ceased to think further of my strange traveling companion.

Four days after, however, my eye was suddenly arrested by the following advertisement in the "sensation" column of the Times: "Left her home, on the evening of the 1st of December, a young lady. Middle heighth and delicate looking; brown hair and eyes, marked eye-brows, oval face. Dressed, when last seen, in a maroon dress, trimmed with velvet and fringe. Is supposed to have with her a hand-bag with initials in gold on it of 'B. B.' Any person giving information as to her whereabouts, or any information whatever, shall be liberally rewarded. Apply, L. B., Post-office, Stonham."

I rubbed my eyes. Did I see clearly? Was I dreaming? No; there was the exact description of my traveling companion—date and description coincided. Then there was some mystery connected with the girl, after all. I thought so.

Five minutes' reflection, and I was writing to "L. B." giving a full account of my journey to town. The letter dispatched, I waited with what patience I could for the next move in the play.

Just as I had finished dinner the next evening and was feeling somewhat lonely, not having my sister to talk to, as had ever been the case since we were left orphans together years ago, the servant entered, saying a gentleman was in the library, who desired to see me, if possible instantly, on very important business. The card sent in bore the name of "Colt Byng."

New for the solution of the mystery! I thought, as, quickly following the servant, I found myself in the presence of a tall, military-looking man, who came forward to meet me in great agitation, and, as I offered my hand, broke out with, "Tell me where to find my daughter, for God's sake!"

Quickly I related the circumstances of our journey, and as I ended the story the poor father dropped his head on his breast, murmuring, "All my fault, my fault. I was too hard with the poor child; I know it now, too late. And yet I believed I was acting for the best. Sir"—turning to me—"I thank you heartily for easing my mind so far. You say you are a lawyer. I pray you unite your efforts with mine; help me to find my child."

We sat late into the night, arranging plans for the following day. I prevailed upon Col. Byng to take up his quarters at my house, that he might be on the spot to compare notes; beside, the poor man was in such a distracted state, it was not fit for him to be in an hotel alone.

Though every available means of the detective force, advertisements, &c., were used, our search proved fruitless. The unhappy father at last, worn out with anxiety, trouble and self-upbraidings, had to return to his home, his affairs there urgently requiring his presence. His parting words to me were: "Leave no stone unturned; spare no expense; find Beatrice. I feel my actions have murdered my child."

Left to myself, I redoubled my efforts, but was baffled at every turn. I tremblingly asked myself, Could it be true? was she no more. That face, so sweet, so pure—that face, which I now felt was my fate—was I never to see again? The thought was maddening. "Leave no stone unturned;" no, there could never again be rest for me until I had found her.

HER SIDE.

Things came to a climax for me that evening. How vividly I remember each particular!

The long low drawing-room, dimly lit by the lamp placed on a small table by the fire, near which sat my stepmother, toying with some bright-colored wools, and talking merrily to the disagreeable synical-looking man at the opposite side of the hearth; while I, at a distant table, pretended to be reading, though all the while my father's parting words kept repeating themselves over and over again in my mind, and dancing before me on the page I in vain tried to read.

"You must accept Mr. Lomax before my return at the end of the week, Beatrice. There must and shall be no further delay, else you will remain no longer in my house."

Those were the fatal words that would give me no rest. I looked across at Mr. Lomax. Accept him? be his wife? belong to him? the wife of a man three times my own age? a man of a morose gloomy temper, whom I instinctively feared as well as hated; whose touch I shuddered at; whose glance seemed to blight me? Because he was rich and I poor, was I therefore to sacrifice my young life? Never, come what might!

"Mr. Lomax wishes you to sing, Beatrice," came from the distance my stepmother's silvery insincere voice. Seeing that I hesitated, she crossed quickly over and hissed in my ear: "Come, no nonsense; do as you are bid instantly, or you go to your room."

Without more ado I went to the piano, found a song that I remembered he particularly disliked, and sung it—badly.

"Really, Beatrice, I cannot congratulate you either on your song or your voice," said Mrs. Byng, for once forgetting her rôle of amiability. "Pray, sing something that will give us some little pleasure to listen to."

Mr. Lomax here joined in: "Yes, Miss Byng; you seem to forget that the last time you sang that song, I expressed my dislike to it."

"So," thought I, "before even I have agreed to marry you, you dare censure me! I wonder what is will be after!

However, I took a piece and played it through. Just as it was finished I found Mr. Lomax at my elbow.

"Cruel Beatrice, not to sing," he murmured; and suddenly encircling me with his arms, kissed me two or three times.

I struggled madly to free myself; jumped up and rushed out of the door; not, however, until I had heard Mrs. Byng's voice saying soothingly, "Don't be dismayed, Mr. Lomax; the dear girl will come round in a day or two, I will answer for it."

"Come round! She would answer for it!"

Half crazed, I fled up the stairs, rushed to my room, and locked the door; then I plunged my face into a basinful of water, to wash away, if possible, every trace of those hated kisses. Yes; he had certainly made a masterly stroke then—he had made me realize how utterly I hated him, and how impossible it was that I could ever marry him. I felt scorched, polluted, by his touch.

And my father had said by his return it was to be a settled thing. Mrs. Byng, of course, had forced him to say that; she wanted no one that her child might reign supreme. Why, not content with forcing this hated marriage upon me, she had even that very day heaped other indignities on me; I had had to do servants' work. O, what was I to do? My father had said I should not remain with him. Then I must marry Mr. Lomax? No—never! Rather would I beg—

Lightning-like, a thought flashed through my mind. Was it possible? I had restlessly been pacing the room; I now stood still. I put my hand to my head to still its throbbings. Yes, I would do it; I would save them all from further trouble. I would disappear. Again I bathed my face, but this time to clear my brain. I looked at my watch—eight o'clock. I remembered suddenly that the London mail stopped at a small station where we were hardly known, about three miles distant, at midnight—plenty of time to catch it.

My resolution was taken. I had five pounds in my dressing-case, given me only a few days previously for allowance. I took it out and began my arrangements. First I packed up a small hand-bag, into which I also put several of my best ornaments, and then I got myself ready for the walk.

The sounds in the house gradually ceased. I heard Mr. Lomax go. I heard my stepmother go to her room, and the usual locking-up take place, and then all was quiet. Half an hour elapsed.

"Now, or never," I thought, and carefully unfastening my door, I crept down-stairs, went into the dining-room and took a glass of wine, and putting into my pocket some biscuits left on the table, I noiselessly opened the French window and stepped out on the terrace.

Free! As lightly as possible I glided, more than walked, past the front of the house, without deigning one farewell glance at the place that, until Mrs. Byng's advent, had been a happy home to me, but that lately had been worse than a prison, and with a sigh of relief found myself beyond the gates, with the long stretch of road before me.

How solitary it looked! Hitherto I had acted in a sort of maze; but the cold night-air, in reviving, also brought me back to the present moment. Should I ever be able to walk those dreadful three miles alone? Looking up suddenly, I saw afar the light glimmering from Mrs. Byng's window; that decided my fate. I ran swiftly on.

Snow was lying on the ground; every bush and twig stood sharply out against the sky clearly defined. As I passed under a belt of fir-trees, the slight noise of my own footsteps startled me; and I glanced behind, to be seized with fear at my own shadow. Turning the corner of the road, a dark moving thing came toward me. What could it be? My feet seemed rooted to the ground, else I must have turned and fled backward. However, as it came nearer, it proved to be only a horse with a sleg on its leg. Taking courage, I rushed past it, and leaving the road, crossed two fields, and began to skirt the river, that being a short cut to the station.

How dark and cold it looked as it glided on! But yet it fascinated me, and I stopped to gaze at it for a moment. What evil spirit prompted the thought? Who could say? Suddenly, quickly, swerved and rad out my fate. Perhaps, for did I quicken speed until the rushing lights came in view. Not one but had been my mad mood so far I might hope that I had gained my liberty.

Putting on a thick veil, I entered and took my ticket for London—only just in time, for the train came up the next minute. How thankful was I to be safe in such a haven of refuge! Sinking back into the first seat, I found I was not alone, a gentleman sat in the opposite side of the carriage; we had not gone far when he omered me his rug, which I gladly accepted, for it was dreadfully cold, and then he seemed to sleep.

During that night I underwent a fery ordeal of doubt and fear. No sleep visited my eyes, my future plans had to be made; but chaos reigned supreme in my mind; and anxious questioning as to whether, after all, I had acted rightly would perplex me. Would the shock harm my father, who, until Mrs. Byng entered the house, had invariably been kind to me? But no! He had been so harsh lately because I had declared I could not do as he wished with respect to Mr. Lomax. The net had gradually closed around me; each day for the last two months I had in vain pleaded to be left free. He had tightened the strings, Mrs. Byng keeping him up to the mark—he had declared I should agree to this marriage, or leave his house. Well, the bird had not free a little sooner than they expected, that was all! Free! But whither next?

At last that night, as every other time, good or evil must come to an end. As soon as it was light my companion began to prepare for leaving the train. I looked at his face; it was good and kind—should I confide in him and beg his help? No; henceforth it was for me to act alone—my rash step had forfeited the woman's prerogative of being taken care of; already punishment came in the thought! However, I plucked up courage to ask him to take me to some place for breakfast; and then, when in a cab after he had bidden me adieu, I felt as though my one remaining friend was gone; there had been a sense of protection even in his presence.

The need of action, however, recalled me to myself. After driving a short distance toward Temple-bar, I ordered the cabman to take me again North, and reaching a part of London I knew, from having been near at school, I got out and paid the man, and then taking my bag in my hand, sought for some quiet inexpensive lodging. Finally, after a weary walk, I succeeded in getting a cheap bedroom in a respectable street; after ordering some necessary things, I sat down to consider the next step to take. Certainly, a suitable change of dress; I would go and buy new things at once. Then I went to a servants' registry-office, and put my name down for a lady's-maid place. My money was not hold out long; thus I might gain an honest livelihood. I thought in my inexperience. Surely in the vortex of London one's identity could be lost!

That night sleep came, and the whole of the next day illness kept me prisoner. It was the reaction; the mind, though still steadfast and firm, could not altogether master the body, which was weak and tender. At last, shaken and feeble, I succeeded in dressing. Horror of horrors! on counting my small stock of money I found it would be barely sufficient to pay the expenses of the past day. Hastily I put on my bonnet and started in search of a situation. I, Beatrice Byng! A lost, was given me, but at each house where I applied the place had just been filled up. Having parted with some of my jewels, I continued my search for a situation, and at the end of a few weeks was sent for to see a lady who was looking out for a maid for her daughters. How odd it felt to be shown into her presence as a servant! I know I behaved strangely, illness had made me nervous; after putting a few general questions, the lady asked for my character.

"I have not lived out before," I answered.

"Then, at all events, young woman, you can give me some reference?"

"No, ma'am," I said; "I can only ask you to try me without any one speaking for me; I will do my utmost to please you."

"Really, this is most abominable of Mrs. Rogers sending me a person without any character; pray go instantly. I never have anything to do with such as you."

A burning blush overspread my face and I withdrew; how I got out of the house I know not. That was the last situation I would seek! Utterly hopeless, and worn out in mind and body, I walked up and down the terraces and squares, dreading to go back to my lonely room, though fearing to be seen and recognised even now. One thought alone brought comfort: far better this life even than that of the betrothed of Mr. Lomax.

It seemed to my excited imagination that people put their heads out of their carriages to look after me; I wondered to myself if I looked as strange and unreal as I felt. Walking along, I caught glimpses of comfortable kitchens, bright fires, and groups of merry servants. It was just dusk. At one house a carriage-load of children was being put down—one young mother even came to the door to meet her child—there was a joyous greeting and much laughter. How the voices thrilled through me! So had I once been. And now, a fugitive and almost starving, I crept along. How good the smell of that dinner being cooked! I had tasted nothing that day. A peal of bells struck on—Christmas-eve! So it was. Choking back my tears I hastened on: no Christmas greetings for me—no kiss, no presents, no joy. No one to take any care whether I lived or died.

With these thoughts I crept back to my lodging: they came and told me even there that they were going out to a family gathering.

"Very well," I responded, "only let me be."

The landlady looked at me sorrowfully, and saying I had best go to bed and get warm—I had no fire—and that she would send me up some tea, left me to my own sad thoughts.

Bitter tears came to my aid, my brain else had been crazed; repentance for my rash step began to make itself felt; conscience whispered that I had not considered sufficiently its possible effect upon others. After all, was not the punishment merited? But then the alternative—marriage with a man I despised as well as hated! Ah, well! Welcome death before that!

The Christmas-bells rang all that evening and far into the night. I sank into a sort of trance; cold and hunger alike were forgotten. I saw a well-lit room, warmth and plenty prevailed, merry childish figures ran about, my father sat at the head of a well-covered table, round him were many bright faces; a little girl dressed to represent Christmas danced up to him, he took her up in his arms and kissed her brow. .....It was myself.....I tried to speak..... and awoke.

Where was I? Was it really me lying there all alone with the cold moonlight resting on my forehead? Was I still dreaming? I sat up and gave a shuddering glance round. Ah yes! This was all real, and I had run away from home, so I had. It seemed a long time ago—years almost. How odd and ill I felt! Surely, I was not going to die there, in that room all alone? I screamed aloud—there was no answer—no one heeded the lonely lodger. I put my clasped hands above my head and prayed for calmness and help in my extremity. Then my thoughts wandered again to death; perhaps I should be found there in the morning lying cold and stiff; they would shake their heads and murmur, "Poor young thing!" The landlady would find a directed envelope in my pocket, and then my father would come up and identify me. I should be put in my coffin carefully and buried in some London cemetery among strangers far away from any one who had ever loved me. My father would repent then his harshness—perchance weep—too late. He would look at me, all so still and white, and know it was his doing that I lay there. How sad it would be to see one so young dead! Would my face change much, I wondered? They would let my long hair down on the pillow, and perhaps strew a few flowers over me; caring for me too late—too late! Mrs. Byng then would grieve, and Mr. Lomax, also. But where should I be, the I that lay there?

Sleep came at last, full of troubled dreams, but blessed, as it brought forgetfulness of the present. Christmas morning, in trying to rise, I fainted; so had to remain where I was. They brought me food out of pity; the woman of the house sat by my bedside, and begged to be allowed to write to my friends.

"There must be some one who cares for you, poor child," she said.

"No one," I sadly answered; "only let me alone."

The next day she again stood at the bottom of my bed; her husband wanted his rent; he refused even to get bread until he was paid; she could not change his resolution. Payment, or else I was to be turned into the street till or till.

"Give me your money, and I will fetch the food," I said; and she complied to the extent of my purse, to her filling hands. The will only just enough—not a farthing over—for all my ornaments I had already pawned. What to do next, alas, I knew not.

Despair gave momentary strength. I rose and dressed. One look at the glass before I left; no one would recognize Beatrice Byng now—no further fear of that. Sunken eyes, hollow cheeks, white lips, (like old, bright Beatrice Byng, then, was really already dead; it was merely her spirit or ghost that moved along now.)

Mechanically I took up my bag, and passed out of the house homeless and friendless.

Wandering aimlessly up and down some quiet terrace near, I felt my little strength was going; money for food must be had somehow. A lamp-post before a well-lit house attracted my attention; surely I might lean against it—no one would say me "nay" there. A sudden impulse, a quick resolve, and I broke out with a hymn I loved: "While shepherds watched their flocks." It was as though an angel sang within me, the voice was so pure and clear. The door of the house opened; some one came to my side; money was held out. I looked up, and saw dimly through a film of tears a gentleman. "Miss Byng!" was all he said, and I lost consciousness.

HIS SIDE.

She fell into these arms. After all, it was decreed that I should find her. I carried her into my house, my sister, who was now quite well, helping me. We laid her in our best guest-chamber. Many days and nights death and love fought together; but love gained the mastery; my darling was restored to health. Day by day she grew to know how I loved her; day by day her heart became mine. In the sweet Spring-time, when flowers bloomed and the violet gave out its perfume, we were married.

Col. Byng gave his daughter away; but Mrs. Byng never even sent a message. I find it hard to forgive her; but Beatrice whispers, "If it had not been for her, we should never have met."—Tinsley's Magazine.

ABSENCE OF MIND.—The forgetfulness arising from sheer absence of mind is different in its nature from any other. The man may be in good health, and may be the reverse of stupid, but he is so absorbed in a particular train of thought as to be nearly oblivious to surrounding sayings and doings. SYDNEY SMITH cited two instances of absence of mind which struck his fancy. "I heard of a clergyman who went jogging along the road till he came to a turnpike. 'What is to pay?' 'Pay, Sir, for what?' asked the turnpike-man. 'Why, for my horse to be sure.' 'Your horse, Sir! What horse? There is no horse, Sir.' 'No horse, God bless me,' said he, suddenly looking down between his legs, 'I thought I was on horseback.' Lord DUDLEY was one of the most absent men I think I ever met in society. One day he met me in the street and invited me to meet myself. 'Dine with me today; dine with me, and I will get SYDNEY SMITH to meet you.' I admitted the temptation he held out to me, but said I was engaged to meet him elsewhere. Another time in meeting me he put his arm through mine, muttering, 'I don't mind walking with him a little way.' I'll talk with him as far as the end of the street.' He very nearly overset my gravity once in the pulpit. He was sitting immediately under me, apparently very attentive, when suddenly he took up his stick as if he had been in the House of Commons, and, tapping the ground with it, cried out in a low but very audible whisper, 'Hear, hear.'" An absence of mind more or less similar has often been displayed by men habituated to deep study. DOMENICHINO, the great Italian painter, became so absorbed in his own picture of the Martyrdom of Saint Andrew that he reviled, with the fiercest passion, a soldier who was represented insulting or mocking the saint. CARACCI, who was present, was so struck with DOMENICHINO'S excited expression of face that he afterward adopted it as an impersonation of rage. CREBILLON, the French dramatist, impatiently said to a friend who entered his study, "Don't disturb me; this is a moment of exquisite happiness; I am going to hang a villainous minister, and to banish a stupid one!" ISAAC D'ISRAELI says: "It has been told of a modern astronomer that one Summer night, when he was withdrawing to his chamber, the brightness of the heavens showed a phenomenon. He passed the whole night in observing it; and when they came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like one who had been collecting his thoughts for a few moments, 'It must be thus; but I will go to bed before it is too late.' He had gazed the entire night in meditation, and was not aware of it." Dr. STUKELY called upon Sir ISAAC NEWTON, and was told that Sir ISAAC would come to him directly. The waiting was long and tedious, dinner was brought in, and STUKELY, feeling hungry, sat down and nearly demolished a tempting roast fowl. NEWTON at length appeared, and, seeing the empty dish, exclaimed, "I protest I had forgotten that I had eaten my dinner!" The Count DE BRANCAS, a friend of LA BRUYERE and ROCHEFOUCAULD, was one day reading in his study, when a nurse brought in a little infant; he put down his book, took up the infant, and caressed it admiringly. A friend came in, and BRANCAS threw down the baby on the table, thinking it was a book, not discovering his error until a loud crying announced it. On another occasion ROCHEFOUCAULD crossed the street to greet him. BRANCAS said, "God help you, my poor man!" ROCHEFOUCAULD smiled, and was about to speak, when the other interrupted him: "I told you that I had nothing for you; there is no use in your teasing me; why don't you try to get work? Such lazy idlers as you make the streets quite disagreeable." ROCHEFOUCAULD'S hearty laugh at length roused him from his reverie. Men have been known to exhibit such instances of absence of mind as the following: Taking out a watch, looking at it, and then asking, "What's o'clock?" going to a house where friends have lived, and forgetting that they had removed; going up to dress for dinner, forgetting the main purpose in view, and getting into bed instead; taking imaginary pinches of snuff while talking, forgetting all the time that the box is empty.

THE LAST OF THE FAIRFAXES.—That grand and hearty Englishman, SYDNEY SMITH, used to laugh at ancestral pride, and to say that the Smith crest, with which all their letters were sealed, was the Smith thumb. I cannot laugh with that lord of laughter there. I would be glad to know that I came of a great line, if it had been God's will. About a year ago there was a paragraph in the papers, of a murder in San Francisco, that I read again and again with a wonderful interest. Col. FAIREAX, so the papers said, had been stabbed in the streets of that city, by some wretch, for a fancied injury. The murdered man had strength enough left to draw his revolver and cover his assassin, who then begged abjectly for mercy, when the dying victim said, quietly: "You have killed me, and I can kill you; but I spare you, villain and coward as you are, for the sake of your wife and little children." If I were not myself, I would love to be the FAIREAX that should succeed that noble fellow, not alone for that splendid piece of chivalry of which there was never more need than there is now, the grace I mean of forbearance unto death in the face of the worst injury one man can inflict on another; not for that alone, but because that man was the last of a mighty line, whose name was the pride of all the boys of my companionship, and whose great mansion once nestled on the southern and sunny side of the highland that gave us only its northern shoulder. We were proud of that Fairfax line. It had disappeared from the country many a year before I was born; but the tradition was strong still of the great Sir THOMAS, who fought with CROMWELL for the people against the King. And we preserved one tradition of him that has never appeared in print:—how his arm was so long that, when he stood stretched to his full height, the palm of the hand rested on the cap of the knee; and in some skirmish, also unrecorded, when our hero was met alone in one of our narrow lanes by eight or ten of the enemy, and it was one down and another come on, Sir THOMAS, by favor of his long arm and stout heart, cut down about half the number, and the rest galloped away. That FAIREAX was a great figure in our juvenile Valhalla. He was one of a line of noble men, with a few exceptions, that had housed itself there at Denton for many hundreds of years. It saw good reason finally for setting in Virginia. Have a great friend WASHINGTON. But not to the [illegible] come down to that [illegible] the quarrel on the Pacific coast. [illegible] an anecdote like that it must be good [illegible] think that man remembered [illegible] FAIREAX, and meant not stain his name with murder for murder, and that had something to do with his noble forbearance. He must die like a FAIREAX. Such persons bring with them into the world a vast advantage over the common run of us. Their organism is like the organ of a great maker—something unique for its sweetness or strength; and the soul, like a great organist, makes a music that is all its own. I think we would all, please God, belong to a kindlike that.—Rev. Robert Collyer, in the Unitarian Herald.

THE MYSTERIOUS LADY OF NISQUALLY.

The Nisqually, which is one of the most lovely and picturesque rivers in the world, empties into Puget Sound a few miles southeast of Steilacoom. Formerly, one of the savage tribes of Indians of the North-west claimed the Nisqually as its hunting-ground, but now only a few poor, miserable, filthy, squalid beings remain of the once powerful tribe, and even they have lost their native energy, and fallen into premature decay.

Many years ago, when these Indians were famous hunters, the traders of the Hudson Bay Company went into their country, and finding them rich in furs, erected a fort, established a trading-post, and soon, by means of blandishments—which they knew so well how to use—won the friendship of those whom they had doomed to destruction; for strange as it may appear, the white trader has always carried to the homes of the Indian disease and death, along with his blankets and trinkets.

When we reached Steilacoom, and commenced making preparations for a fortnight in the forest, I was deputed to learn something of the country; and in answer to my inquiries, nearly every body would reply:

"Jake Warden can tell you all about the country; and if you want to have a good time, you had better get Jake to go with you."

I hunted up Mr. Warden, and found him in a liquor-saloon, in the act of swallowing a quantity of brown, or amber-colored, spirits. He was a tall, sunburnt man, drawing very near to the three-score mark of human life, of a dull countenance, and listless manner. His frame appeared loose and flexible, but it was vast, and, in reality, of prodigious power. The inferior lineaments of his countenance were coarse, extended, and vacant; while the superior, or those nobler parts, which are thought to affect the intellectual being, were low, receding, and mean. His dress was a mixture of the coarsest vestments of a husbandman with the leathern garments that are affected by frontiersmen. There was also a singular and wild display of prodigal and ill-judged ornaments blended in his motley attire.

I introduced myself immediately, and informed the hunter what I desired. After having explained my wishes to him, I awaited his reply. He looked at me in a lazy sort of manner, and drawled out:

"You fellars air from the city, ar'n't ye?"

"Yes."

"And ye don't know nothin' about the woods?"

"Our knowledge is limited."

"And ye would like to have some good huntin' and fishin'?"

"Yes."

"Ar' ye goin' fur a reg'lar time ov it?"

"Yes."

"Goin' to take a good supply of drinkables along, hain't ye?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll go; and if yer don't have lots of fun, I'm a Siwash (Indian.) When do you want to start?"

"As soon as possible."

"Then I'll just go and git my plunder, and jine ye."

He had kept his word, had led us into the forest, and now, at the end of the first day's hunting and fishing, we were enjoying such comfort as rest always brings after great fatigue.

The conversation was beginning to flag and lose its interest, when our guide said:

"Ef you'll pass along that ar' jug of pizin, I'll take a drop to moisten my gullet and ile the hinges of my tongue, and then spin yes a yarn of the 'arly days of this yere country."

Mr. Warden raised the demijohn to his lips, and held it there for something more than a minute, and until two great lachrymal globules burst from his eyes and slowly rolled down his cheeks. Then, setting the cherished casket between his legs, and wiping his lips with the cuff of his coat, he said:

"Boys, ye are trumps! Ef ye don't know nothin' about huntin' bar or skelpin' red-skins, yer has a taste that can't be denied, and I'm proud to bear testimony to the fact that yer selection of liquor can't be beat. In fact, boys, ye possesses a talent for it which almost amounts to a genius. I'll drink yer healths."

"Now, lemme see," said Mr. Warden, after having paid his respects to the demijohn a second time; "lemme see what I'll tell ye. Yes, I'll tell ye about the Mysterious Lady of Nisqually. That was something I never could understand, although I was quite curious, and tried to sift the matter to the bottom. But them old factors was too close-mouthed, and wouldn't let out a word."

It's now nearly forty years since I arrived on the Pacific coast and took employment with the Hudson Bay Company. During my wanderings over this country, and my tarryings at the various trading-posts, I learned a good deal of their trickery; but nothing in all my experience, ever puzzled me half so much as the history of that Mysterious Lady of Nisqually.

I think it is nigh on to thirty years since I came up to the Sound, and put up my wigwam at the fort built by the Company, a few miles below, on the river. I am't very good at figures, consequently the dates may get a little mixed, but the facts are remembered just as vividly as if they happened only yesterday.

At the time of my arrival, there were hardly any white men in this part of the world; and what few there were owed allegiance to the Company, and dared not object to anything decreed by a factor.*

A factor's word was law among those employed by the Company, as well as among the Indians, that made their homes at the forts; and I can remember more than one instance where the sentence of death was pronounced, and carried into effect, upon persons whose offenses were not hanging matters, if they had been tried by the law.

I mention these things, in order that you may know why I never got at the bottom of the mystery. A short distance from the factor's residence was a little cottage, inclosed by a high fence. The only means of ingress or egress to this cottage was through a heavy gate, which was always kept locked and guarded by a sharp-eyed, close-mouthed Scotchman, who would make no acquaintance with any of the other employes. The only thing he was ever known to do, was to stand guard at that gate, and to follow and watch the person held there as a prisoner, when she was permitted to go abroad—or, rather, when she desired to go abroad, for, with the exception of keeping her strictly to herself, she was permitted the largest liberty.

I had been at the fort only a few days before I discovered that the cottage was the prison-house of a female—a young woman—about as pretty as human flesh could be made. "I ain't got no good descriptive powers"—to use his exact words—"or I'd tell you how she looked; but I'm a first-rate judge ov beauty, and will pledge you my faith that she was regular stunnin'. That old Scotchman, standin' or sittin' in front of that gate all the time, had aroused my curiosity, and I axed a good many questions, trying to find out what it all meant, but could get from them only a shrug of the shoulders and a peculiar grimace, which meant very little or a good deal, just as it happened."

I finally made bold enough to ask the old Scot, but got from him only a surly, growling intimation that I had better mind my own business, and not meddle with the concerns of others. Shortly afterward I was called into the store by the factor, cautioned against pursuing my investigations, and dismissed with a warning.

The evident desire to keep the secret of this cottage was a sore temptation to me, and I determined to risk everything to solve the mystery, but was compelled to bide my time and opportunity. My rashness had caused me to be watched, and it was not until all suspicion had been allayed, that I could, with safety, make another effort.

One day, I was returning from an excursion up the Puyallup River, and was leisurely walking across one of those beautiful prairies which abound in this region. Now, these prairies are about as nearly pleasant as one can see in a day's walk, but they "ain't worth shucks for farmin' purposes." The soil is hard and unyielding, the herbage meagre, sour, and fit only for sheep; even the deer refuse to browse upon it. A wagon or vehicle could travel over it as lightly as upon a beaten road, while the hoofs of animals hardly more than bruised the grass; but as they fell upon the ground they made a noise that could be heard a long distance. Stopping for a moment under the shade of a solitary tree, to enjoy the beauty of the scene, my ears caught the sound of approaching horses. Looking in the direction whence the sound came, I saw that one of them was ridden by a woman of not more than sixteen and twenty years of age. Her hair was about the color of corn-silk in August, while her features, notwithstanding they showed traces of sorrow, were very beautiful. The other animal, which was fully two hundred yards in the rear, was ridden by the Scottish guard of the cottage. I instantly surmised that the beautiful female was the prisoner, and stepped out for the purpose of attracting her attention, and giving her an opportunity to address me. The woman no sooner caught sight of me than she turned her horse's head toward the spot where I was standing. The movement was observed by the Scot, who, sinking his heavy spurs into his horse's sides, urged him forward at the top of his speed, at the same time shouting:

The lady had the advantage of her guard, and was soon beside me, but did not stop to speak. As she passed, she gave me a look full of meaning, and which seemed to say, "I would give worlds for a half-hour's conversation with you, but I will have to postpone it till some other occasion."

As the Scot rode past, he said, "Ye did weel to keep yer tongue within your mouth."

This little incident increased my desire to know more about the fair prisoner, but my judgment told me that if I would learn I must use strategy. I could not understand why the girl should be guarded so closely, nor why she had been sent to this far, out-of-the-way place for imprisonment. After this, I quite frequently caught sight of the prisoner, but she was always attended by the Scot, who never, for a single instant, relaxed his vigilance, or gave her an opportunity to speak to a single soul. Many a night have I laid awake, puzzling my brain over the matter, and wondering if the mystery would ever be revealed.

A year had passed away since my arrival at the fort, and still the young girl was held a prisoner. Her keepers, however, had long ceased to exercise an espionage upon my actions and movements, because I had taken pains to allay their suspicions. At length, finding that I could move about the fort without having an Indian at my heels, I commenced making preparations for an interview with the fair prisoner. It is not necessary, for the understanding of my story, that I should weary you with explaining how I laid my plans, constructed scaling-ladders from rope made of bark; how, upon one dark night, when the rain was pouring down in torrents and the wind sighed mournfully through the trees, I stole forth from my cabin, and soon found myself within the inclosure and beside the cottage, gazing in to the room occupied by her.

Notwithstanding the hour was past the meridian of night, the fair occupant of the room was still awake. I was puzzled how to attract her attention, and not at the same time startle her and cause her to scream, or give some alarm, which would bring the old Scotchman to interrupt the proposed interview. After revolving a number of schemes and rejecting them all, I tapped gently upon the glass, at the same time placing myself in such a position that I could be seen the moment her eyes were raised to the window. The noise caused the girl to raise her head, and, as she did so she caught sight of me. Her face blanched with terror, and she opened her mouth as if to scream; but by a desperate struggle she choked down her feelings and tottered toward the door, opened it, and said something which I thought was an invitation to enter, and which I accepted as such.

Motioning me to be seated, she commenced telling me something, but as she spoke in French I could not understand a word she said. Here was a pretty condition of affairs! After all my trouble to find out how I could aid and assist the unfortunate lady, to be balked at the very moment when success appeared certain! I told her that I could not understand a word she was saying; that I was totally ignorant of all languages but my native one. A shade of deep disappointment passed over her features, and she stood for a moment as if revolving in her mind what to do. Suddenly, a bright gleam illuminated her face, her eyes sparkled with pleasure, and she seated herself at a table, seized a pen, and dashed off a letter, which she folded, addressed, and handed to me with a gesture, which seemed to say, "Will you be kind enough to post that for me?" I took the letter,

THREE CELEBRATED COFFEE ROOMS.

Through a narrow portal, a few doors north-east of Temple Bar, over which a gilt bird yearly turns, have entered many generations of hungry Englishmen. There is an hostel of the Cock Tavern in Fleet-street who has not at some period of whether in the gradual existence been informed of the extreme antiquity of that ancient dining place. As you nibbled up the last green leaf of your salad, or drained with a lingering plaintiveness the last drop in your tankard, the head waiter, after gently contemplating the fire, or adjusting the burnished kettle, was in the habit of mitigating the pain, fulness of Rabelais' "magnific quart d'heure" by gravely producing a round snuff-box, containing a farthing token of the house at the time of the plague, and, with it a great volume of Pepys, thumbed black by Templars and inky-handed lawyers' clerks. Alluding to the following advertisement of the place, which, perhaps you will remember, with benignant condescension as you read, words that though two hundred years old, seem just written:

"This is to certify that the master of the Cock and Bottle, commonly called the Cock Alehouse at Temple Bar, hath dismissed his servants and shut up his house for this long vacation, intending, God willing, to return at Michaelmas next, so that all persons whatsoever who may have any accounts with the said house, or farthings belonging to the said house (the pump only excepted) you then are you come to contain yourselves, and publish the venerable box never yet shut, but thrown to repair thither before the 6th of this inst. and they shall receive satisfaction."

At this time the fatal red cross was to be seen on thousands of barred-up doors, and according to that amiable old trusty worthy gentleman, Mr. Evelyn (then a Commissioner for the cure of the sick, and appointed in the Dutch war) there were above forty in London of the Plague about 10,000 weekly. Lemon of the Mitre, about 10,000 "I went all day," says the Chronicler, "in the Fleet to see the prisoners, and so home, the City and the infection encreased, so as I saw more coffins exposed in the streets, now than of people. The shops shut up and all in mourning almost, not knowing whom next sight to meet." All who could afford it were flying from London, huge pits for the dead were digging in Bunhill Fields. Dying people, mad with the disease, were occasionally met in the suburban streets, and at stated hours the doleful dead-carts came round to collect the dead. In the city, however, the footings abated, and the landlord of the Cock returned, as his face in his rusty gratey, scoured bright his gridiron, and that old servant, Jacobean chattel piece, still over the Fleet-street fire, whose ghostly again in the dancing flame.

On April 29, 1666, (the year after the Dutch were in the Medway) we find Pepys, then a busy well-to-do important man in Court and city, being Clerk of the Navy of the Navy, and living in some style in Seething-lane, Tower-street, frequenting himself at the Cock Ale-house in Fleet-street. Mr. Pepys, then only thirty, was very fond of music, the theatre, and the gentle pastime of pretty actresses, sometimes, indeed, romping the balcony of Mrs. Pierce—and seldom fail to get in his delightful diary to note all "great beauties" and "fine ladies" he met. He was at this time very partial to the society of Mrs. Knipp, an actress of the King's House, a pretty, "excellent, mad-humored thing, who sang divinely, and talked frequently at Nothing-table, in the Pepys's "Rosamond" which has kept, "Hooper, Dicky," Knipp, or apparently, playfully call Mr. Samuel Pepys, while he named her Barbary Allen, after a little Scotch song, in which the artful and somewhat dangerous syren excelled. That Pepys would have had in his office had "Knipp" been only thanked and praised for the difference and fidelity by the King and the Duke of York. Anxious not to overstrain the bow, he had laid down, March 24, 1665, the following very sensible rule of life: "The truth is, I do indulge myself a little more in pleasure, knowing that this is the way of my life to do it, and not to put it off to hereafter, the more, too, that, do thrive in the world, do forget to take pleasure during the time that they have getting their estate, but reserve that till they have gotten, and then it is too late for them to do it." After this, recorded pages of the Pepys and diary of the busy man at the Admiralty, we can follow him through Temple Bar, his footsteps before the thoroughness of Mr. Lemon.

The New-York Times,

NEW-YORK, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1871.

THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY,
DAILY, WEEKLY AND SEMI-WEEKLY.

This journal is now thoroughly identified with the grandest political necessity of the hour—uncompromising warfare against all forms of corruption, whether in national or local government. For years past the TIMES has been exposing the demoralizing influence of self-interested politicians, and its recent warfare upon the Tammany Democrats has been received with universal approval. It has adhered to the pledge given in its original prospectus, more than twenty years ago, that the public should be truly represented, and their interests faithfully guarded through its columns. Its record has been pure and honorable, and the highest aim of its proprietors is to render it more and more worthy of its past history, and of the confidence which the public reposes in it. Two out of three of the original proprietors still direct its policy, and guide it on all public questions. They purpose that the TIMES shall continue to keep clear of all narrow and unworthy influences, and cliques, and aim to represent the great body of the public, as distinguished from personal factions. It occupies a perfectly independent position, and is free to speak the truth on all subjects and about all men. Its greatly increased circulation throughout the country adds to its power and influence. It will continue to be a faithful exponent of Republican principles, and advocate with unstinting energy every cause which tends to further the welfare of the people.

The utmost care will be devoted to gathering political news from special sources during the Presidential canvass. This department of the paper will be unusually full and trustworthy. Renewed enterprise will be exhibited in every department of the paper, and large space will be devoted to reports of speeches made during elections, or on other important political occasions.

A very full summary of news, and many general articles of great interest, are published in the Semi-Weekly editions; and in the Weekly edition there is an unabridged report of the proceedings at the Pioneer Club; an excellent summary of political information, and a great variety of matter suitable for family reading.

The NEW-YORK TIMES is pre-eminently a family paper, all objectionable advertisements being rigidly excluded; and it has a constantly increasing circulation among the most respectable classes of the community.

The Motive of Anarchy.

It is barely three months ago since the corrupt clique which still sits like an incubus upon this City aroused such a tempest of popular indignation that they recoiled before it in affright. What the Mayor did in "General Order No. 37" he is trying, more covertly and insidiously, to do again. On the 10th of July he proclaimed that the will of the mob was the law of New-York. Today he and his colleagues are fighting on the side of outrage and violence, are doing their best to throw the Government of this City into hopeless confusion, and are openly boasting that no instruments are too vile and no means too base to aid them in accomplishing this object. For the first time in several years, there is an honest man in the Controller's office, possessed with a single devotion to the service of the people, and resolved that nothing shall deter him from discharging his duties with impartial justice. ANDREW H. GREEN is at this moment the sole representative of peaceable administration and Municipal solvency. HALL, SWEENY, TWEED, and HILTON stand in the front rank of those who are trying to block the wheels of government, to raise disorder, and discontent, and to throw the City affairs into hopeless confusion. The taxes for the year cannot be collected until the Board of Supervisors has formally approved of the Tax Levy. Had the Ring been free to receive this money and expend it as they pleased, the books would have been in the hands of the Commissioners several weeks ago. Now that Mr. GREEN stands ready to see that the money is honestly spent, and to give warning of any attempt to rob the Treasury, the members of the Board of Supervisors find that their other engagements deter them from performing the routine duty to the taxpayers for which they are very handsomely paid. There were two meetings last week, at which no quorum was present, and one at which no action was taken, and it was only yesterday that the Tax Levy was at last confirmed. Meanwhile the Treasury has been kept empty, all sorts of requisitions have been crowded upon the Controller with a view to embarrass him, and the City laborers have been incited to riot in the vain attempt to frighten him. The Board of Supervisors has merely obeyed the bidding of its masters, the Ring, and the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund show an equal degree of alacrity in doing their best to obstruct public business. A meeting was called on Friday for very urgent business, but as Mayor HALL, Chamberlain BRADLEY, Recorder HACKETT and Alderman DUNOND contrived to be absent, there was no quorum. Not content with stealing the money that should have been employed to pay school teachers, firemen, laborers, and City clerks, the Ring is determined that money from which they cannot get their "rake" shall be as difficult to raise as they can possibly make it.

It was not sufficient, however, that means should be taken to irritate as much as possible every one in the City employ. It required some one to do the dirty work of stirring up the passions of what was presumed to be the most excitable and most ignorant portion of our Municipal servants. For this noble office a ready volunteer was found in Judge HILTON. It appears that this official is not sufficiently occupied in the work of making up-town squares hideous, and in marring the labors of better men in Central Park. He aspires to be the Ring's go-between. His first attempt in this direction resulted in ruining the character of a religious journal and in making its editor the laughing-stock of the town. His next has ended in giving a vile sheet published in this City, a still viler reputation, if that be possible, and in its author being repaid by the quiet contempt of one associate, and in having a highly disagreeable brand placed on his forehead by another, who, disreputable as he is, appears respectable from the contrast. And all that the superserviceable HILTON and his infamous tool have as yet effected is the assemblage of a meeting of park laborers who agree upon a very unmistakable denunciation of the officials above them, very slightly qualified by an ironical vote of thanks to the Ring and its apologist, the Herald, for certain perfectly imaginary services.

Judge HILTON stands convicted, in spite of a very explicit denial, of having attempted to incite a riot by the basest of suggestions. His infamy cannot reflect upon the Bench which he has quitted, nor can it sensibly deepen the stain which rests upon the City Government of which he forms a part. But he is well-known in this community as the confidential adviser of one of our greatest merchants. Is Mr. A. T. STEWART content that anybody should suppose that he approves of the public acts of his trusted agent? Can he, with his marble palace and his splendid stores, think calmly of a city given over, for a space however brief, to riot and pillage? The chief among his servants has tried to bring about such an event, and if he has failed, it is from no fault of his. The community has already passed its verdict upon HILTON; there is some natural curiosity to hear what is the verdict of Mr. STEWART.

The Employment of Children in Factories.

A vigorous effort will be made, during the next session of the Legislature, to restrain by law the employment of very young children in the factories and workshops of the State. There is no class whom the Legislature and all humane persons should more carefully watch over and guard from injustice and oppression than the children of the industrious poor. While the boys and girls of the comfortable classes are in nurseries and schools, these unfortunate children are obliged to contribute to the support of their families by severe and premature labors. In the tenderest years they are sent forth to workshops and factories, to earn their little quota each week for their parents. It is the experience of all manufacturing countries, that no amount of paternal feeling or motherly affection will prevent the hard-working poor from using their children to aid them in the severe struggle for a livelihood. The father reasons that he must labor from morning till night for his offspring, and it is but right that they should do as much for him. The mother dreads "the wolf at the door," and will make any sacrifice to keep him out. Moreover, such considerations as the health and constitution of the children, or their moral and mental education, are remote ones, and do not affect deeply the minds of the poor. They look first at the near advantage, and the child's wages are a substantial gain.

So it happens that every manufacturing country soon sees its shops and factories crowded with that sad throng—children, pale and worn and grown old before their time, doing heavy work when they should be at play or at school. The child thus tasked too early becomes stunted in body and dwarfed in mind. The seeds of disease are laid in our youthful laboring population; they have none of the pleasures or the best training of childhood; they seldom attend any school, and the occupation they learn is generally some small portion of a complicated trade. They grow up a weakened, ignorant, miserable class of factory hands. So powerfully have the humane in Great Britain felt this keen injustice done to these unfortunate children, that Parliament has taken upon itself the especial guardianship of this oppressed class, and the Blue Books of the Kingdom are full of act after act, framed with the utmost stringency, to restrain the selfishness of parents, and to control the greed of capitalists in this matter.

In this country, the State of Massachusetts early felt its duty in protecting this helpless class, and very strict legislation has been framed to control the evil. Rhode Island and Connecticut have passed similar laws, so that in all these States the employment and schooling of factory children are under careful restraint and direction. To the credit of that very intelligent class, the New-England manufacturers, it should be said that they have met this legislation more than half way, and are doing all in their power to aid its humane objects. New-York, however, has been an exception to this benevolent reform. In this City, and, we presume, in every large town of the State, a multitude of very young children are employed in factories or shops from ten to twelve hours per day. There are manufactories in this City which work children as young as eight years, and child-laborers of ten, twelve, and thirteen years can be counted by the thousands.

These infantile workers labor the whole day long, with no more refreshment or variety than a mature laborer has, and no opportunity of schooling or mental improvement. It is the representation of those most useful public servants—the teachers of the "industrial schools"—that no more touching spectacle is ever presented to them, than the eagerness and ardor of these tired children to acquire knowledge in the "night schools" opened for their benefit.

A great class of youth is thus growing up in this City, enfeebled in body and only partially educated, sometimes wholly unschooled, to swell the great mass of ignorant voters who now threaten the very structure of our society. This employment of infants by selfish parents or indifferent manufacturers, is beside an injustice and wrong which the State should remedy. We hear with satisfaction that a law to remedy these increasing evils has been framed by the counsel of the Children's Aid Society and one of its trustees, Mr. C. E. WHITEHEAD, and that this benevolent guardian of the interests of the children of the poor will present the proposed act at the next session. Of the features which ought to characterize such a law, and the defects which it should avoid, we shall speak on another occasion.

Wonderful "Enterprise" of the New-York Herald.

The New-York Herald is endeavoring to find suitable employment for its "fifteen editorial writers—one-third European"—by palming off upon the public a number of spurious "telegrams" about the Queen of England, Mr. DISRAELI, the Court Journal, and other subjects in which its "European" writers (five out of the great fifteen,) may naturally be disposed to feel a greater interest than in New-York affairs. While everybody (even in England) is talking about New-York, the "great American newspaper" is full of twaddle about the Queen of England. The Herald has no time to devote to American politics, but it can fill up dozens of its columns with "cable telegrams," written in its own office, about a foreign monarch. It has to this day deliberately and dishonestly suppressed every particle of evidence relating to the Ring frauds. It has never published one of the fraudulent warrants. In fact, for weeks together it roundly denied that there had been any frauds at all, and confidently affirmed that the present City Government was the best in the world. It has lent itself to the circulation of the vilest of all the slanders which the "Ring" put in circulation against their opponents, and the other day it crowned its efforts by attempting to incite a riot—anticipating HALL and HILTON's filthy sheet by only a few hours. Can anyone be surprised that such a paper should now endeavor to sustain its ruined prestige by publishing "bogus" telegrams? Can a lie more or less be of much consequence to it?

The "enterprise" of the Herald is one of those things which people keep on talking about long after it ceases to exist. The Herald has long lived upon the recollection of its former achievements. It now uses tremendous head lines for news which comes in common to all the Associated Press journals, and puts "Special to the Herald" over everything, and varies this agreeable reading with disgusting advertisements of assignation houses and abortionists. No doubt there is an ignorant man here and there, who really believes that the Herald receives exclusively these telegraphic dispatches. But most people begin to see that the only enterprise it actually shows is in warning people that if they grumble at being robbed they shall have a mob set at them, and in devoting the bulk of its columns to manufactured news about its friend the Queen of England.

Proof is better than assertion, and we will now give the public an opportunity of forming its own conclusions about the "enterprise" of the Herald in getting news. It must be understood that foreign news which comes to one journal must be sent to all other papers which belong to the Associated Press. In accordance with this rule the following message was sent to our office on Tuesday night:

"Right Hon. BENJAMIN DISRAELI, in proposing the health of the Queen at a dinner at Hughenden today, said she was morally and physically incapacitated from performing her public duties any longer. The excitement is tremendous. Some of the journals will suppress this part of the speech."

This message (which never had any foundation in fact) was rewritten in the Herald office, and spun out into the following form:

"Right Honorable BENJAMIN DISRAELI, ex-Premier of England, has succeeded in producing a political and popular agitation in Great Britain which may result in effecting, the most serious, if not startling, consequences suddenly.

The learned gentleman has placed himself in direct collision with the Crown and its authority, as it is worn and wielded by Queen VICTORIA. He has accomplished the act deliberately, willfully and publicly.

Mr. DISRAELI attended a dinner today at Hughenden, his country residence and home. In proposing the toast of the health of Her Majesty the Queen, he took occasion to assure his friends and neighbors that the sovereign lady has become physically, and is morally, incapacitated from performing her public duties longer.

This assertion was accompanied with sentences of fervent eulogy of Her Majesty personally, concluding with the words that her duties are excessive, and that no Englishman is under such complete control of the political traditions of the country as its sovereign."

His words have been published. The utterance has produced the most tremendous excitement among the people. It is canvassed by the highest of the aristocracy, and talked of among the most humble of the democracy.

DISRAELI has overshadowed GLADSTONE almost completely, in the eyes of the people, who have been accurately informed of every word of his remarks, despite a very vigorous effort which has been made by some of the metropolitan journals to suppress them by non-publication.

The subject of the propriety of an abdication by the Queen is spoken of in the clubs, and very many of the most extreme loyalists now regret that Her Majesty did not hearken to the advice which was given to her by the late Lord PALMERSTON years since, when he counseled her to delegate a part of her monarchical duty—such as the signing of acts of Parliament—by royal warrant to a member of the Privy Council, and thus begin of her own free will to accustom the public mind to her gradual and graceful disappearance from the throne years before her death.

The Queen rejected PALMERSTON's advice, and has since held on to a rigid assertion of every essential of the royal prerogative, with that spirit of tenacity or obstinacy which has been ever characteristic of the reigning members of her family.

DISRAELI is likely to master the public or six. Notwithstanding. His bold diagnosis of the state of health of the Queen is accepted very generally as being correct. The Royal lady has remained fevered and irritable during very many months. She has been lately afflicted with inflammatory sore throat and most painful glandular tumors, and has only just shaken off a severe attack of general illness. People speak of the tendency to insanity which is hereditary in her family, and there remains, on the whole, not the slightest doubt that DISRAELI has expressed a sentiment which is already national—VICTORIA's abdication, cheaper government, or a complete change in the form of the ruling power of Great Britain."

Not a line of this pretended dispatch came over the wires. What is this but an impudent fraud on the public? Look at the silly verbiage which the "fifteen editorial writers of the Herald, one-third European," palm off upon the readers of the Herald as news. Look at that paragraph about "DISRAELI's bold diagnosis of the state of health of the Queen," and the "royal lady's inflammatory sore throat," and all the rest of the trumpery. Is it not enough to make any intelligent reader sick? And yet the Herald calls itself an enterprising paper, and boasts of its "American" characteristics. It has been taught a severe lesson of late—look at the piles of unsold Heralds on every newsstand—and it is not yet through its troubles. A paper which fraudulently suppresses real news, and devotes itself to the manufacture of spurious news—which tries to incite the Irish to commit riot—which is the great go-between of abortionists—and which is the organ of vile houses and Tammany thieves, cannot expect to enjoy much of the public confidence. The people of New-York are thinking just now about their dishonest rulers, not about the Queen of England, to whom the Herald devotes columns every day. Are people in these serious days willing to buy and read such muck as the above "telegram, special to the Herald,"—the composition of some "gentleman" from the Emerald Isle?

Defects in Brooklyn Schools.

The City of Brooklyn has, in some respects, a more defective and absurd provision for the education of its children than any considerable city in the United States. It has a large number of schools and school-houses, and a full force of teachers, while the numerical force of its Board of Education is certainly not to be despised. There are, in fact, 50 school buildings, 828 teachers, and 44 members of the Board. But this formidable array of figures is not indicative of corresponding completeness in the school system. The report of the Superintendent, just published, shows that, with the half hundred schools, the portion of the community for which free education ought to be, and can be, most readily supplied—viz., that which requires primary instruction—is really but scantily accommodated. "With hardly an exception," says Mr. BULKLEY, "the primary schools are full to overflowing, and applicants for admission are daily refused because there is no room for them." On the other hand, the grammar departments of many of the schools are very lightly attended. But not only is the number of primary schools too small, and the sittings they furnish too few, but the scholars suffer, in addition to the evils of overcrowding, from deficiency in the number of teachers, and from the incapacity of those employed. We have certainly no disposition to be harsh critics of the young creatures who, for the most part, are actually engaged in the primary schools of Brooklyn. They work hard for poor pay and have little possibility of advancement in their art. But the system which employs them as one of outrageous injustice to the interests it pretends to care for, and of extreme stupidity in a matter of very great delicacy and importance. It is a system that intrusts the most difficult part of a teacher's duty—the awakening and direction of ideas in the bright but untried minds of children—to young girls, slightly educated at best, wholly uninstructed in the art of teaching, inexperienced in the control of children, lacking the moral and mental development that only experience can give, doubly-worked and only half paid. Such a system, considered in the light of the incalculable importance of the ends it is set to serve, is not less absurd than cruel, clumsy, and wasteful.

What is true of the teachers in the primary schools of Brooklyn is true to a considerable extent of many of the teachers in all the schools of that city. They are, as a class, poorly paid, hard worked, and not possessed of that training which is as much a relief to the teacher as an advantage to the pupil. The Superintendent's report gives a list of twenty cities in which the average cost of education, based on the wages of teachers, is more than in Brooklyn, the figures varying from $18 65 per capita for that city, to $13 05 for New-York, $21 57 for Cincinnati, and $25 05 each for St. Louis and Boston. This means simply that every teacher in Brooklyn is required to teach nearly twice as many scholars for the same pay, or gets half the pay for teaching the same number of scholars, as the teachers of Boston and St. Louis. The fact is one to be ashamed, not proud, of.

Brooklyn lacks, moreover, three portions of the school system now recognized as essential in every city of anything like the same size, and situated as Brooklyn is. It has no normal school for the instruction of its teachers, no high school for the completion of the education of those capable and desirous of completing it, and no provision for German instruction. These defects do not admit of argument. They have long since passed beyond the point where their merit—their necessity, in fact—was questioned. The condition of the Brooklyn schools, and the report of their Superintendent, only need to be compared with the condition of other schools and the reports of other superintendents to show how woefully behind the City of Brooklyn is.

The defects we have pointed out arise from two sources—the inefficiency of the Board of Education, and that of the Superintendent of Schools. The Board is clumsy in size, has but few men especially adapted to the peculiar work they have to do, and is a relic of the time when Brooklyn was a village. The awkwardness and general incapacity of the Board are, unfortunately, not compensated by skill or fitness in the Superintendent. The report of this officer, whose position is obviously one requiring culture, originality, and special training, shows him to possess none of these qualities.

It is a slipshod, sentimental, rhetorical document, giving but little real information, and that in an almost unintelligible form. Its statements are contradictory, its criticisms, if well meant, feeble, and its suggestions distressingly vague and useless. Moreover, it gives incontestable proof that its author is unfit for his position, in presenting numerous instances of gross grammatical blunders, and of hopeless confusion of statement.

A Show at Bar-Maids.

The "show" of fat men with which our people are occasionally regaled is tasteful and exhilarating, no doubt, to those who like it, and the various shows of prize babies, cats, hogs, and so forth, have each their separate claims to admiration. A "show of bar-maids" however, lately devised by some British Barnum, certainly outshines any entertainment of this description of which we have heard. American readers know, even before they were instructed by Mr. DICKENS in "Mugby Junction" that it is customary in England for young women to sell refreshments, the cost of which may be presumed to be enhanced by the fair hands that dispense them. The performance in question took place at the North Woolwich Gardens, and took the form of a contest for superiority, of which the attending and paying public were to be the witnesses and judges. Certain conditions were to be observed by the contestants, among which we observe that "extreme neatness of costume" was one; besides this "every young lady is expected to ingratiate herself with the public in the most affable manner at her command, without undue forwardness or frivolity." From the accounts, we perceive that the affair was progressing in a large hall wherein the competing bar-maids were stationed at tables amply provided with various refreshments, and that all visitors were supplied with "public voting cards," by which the contest was in the end to be decided.

The show was attracting much interest, and the bar-maids were making superhuman efforts for victory. From the "personal" description of the Press, it is clear that the conflict of energetic fascination must have been sharp indeed. One young woman, described as "a very pretty specimen of the moille Brittanica, or ordinary bar-maid, is dressed in blue and white, and might sit as a model for BERANGER's Lisette." Another is "a handsome, but rather showy sample; she wears an upper robe of dark mauve over a skirt of canary silk, and sports an amber rose in her hair." Number seven has "tresses long as the cristite lopes," but has the charm of being attired with extreme neatness in Cambridge blue, relieved with plain cuffs of snowy white, and has "prepossessing features and an agreeable manner to boot." Twelve is conspicuous for being the only one who had the happy thought to dress her hair in corkscrew curls. Another young lady is equally distinguished in having close-cropped hair over her brows as the mediæval fashion was, and which is now again in vogue. Number eighteen running an unmistakable rival to her sister's plump head, is fair as the lily; she is gifted with "a frank, easy demeanor, pleasant gray eyes, and rich, smooth coils of glossy fair hair." This seven hundred and some-body's "lacent drop times with cinnamon," whereupon somebody immediately handed her his voting paper. We are fearful, indeed, that like Capt. SCOTT's sons, humanized customers came down rather too readily in this and other cases, without putting to legitimate test the means that should make them do so. It is clear that this happened too often to a "charming specimen, in white pique, with pyramid of sunny braids, labelled 38," and also to a captivating chess-board of a bar-maid, whose "form in mingled black and white was like HORACE's modes in odes." The reigning favorite, however, in spite of the more fashionable blondes, appears to have been "a lively brunette, petite and graceful, quietly garbed in black, with lace collar, and a scarlet ribbon in her ebon collar." Betting was very brisk, we are told, on this competitor, and the balance of chances seems unmistakably inclined in her favor.

The pleasure afforded by this alluring and useful exhibition must have been supreme, and the announcement of the result, news of which has not yet come forward, must have caused much excitement. Only one reflection occurs to us as likely to cast a shadow on the general joy—which is that the normal function of these irresistible Hebes must separately so soon be abandoned. It is quite out of the natural order of things that, after being "shown" in such a manner, these bewitching dispensers of sakes and ale should long continue to exercise their calling. From maids they must infallibly and swiftly be metamorphosed into wives. Who, for example, can imagine the "somebody" who was inveigled by the "lacent drop times with cinnamon" hesitating for an instant to try to win his fair betrayer? Such a result as this could hardly have been contemplated by the enterprising adventurer who got up the show, or he would surely have declined to make himself the intermediary of a quasi-social agency of so deadly a character.

Bishop Selwyn.

There is a memorable passage in HALLAM's history in which he compares that famous light of the English Church, "the judicious HOOKER," to "a knight of romance among cuffin brawlers." If there be among modern Church of England dignitaries a knight of romance, it is surely Bishop SELWYN, who is on his way to the Episcopal Convention here, and whose experience of ecclesiastical life has been perfectly unique in the records of prelacy.

The SELWYNS come of a long line of lawyers. The Bishop's grandfather was one of His Majesty's counsel, learned in the law, a "Bencher," and Treasurer of Lincoln's Inn. His father followed with like success the same profession, and became widely known by SELWYN's Nisi Prius, a work which has gone through an extraordinary number of editions, and been the constant companion of every English barrister for half a century.

Soon after his marriage, Prince ALBERT, being desirous of becoming better acquainted with the constitution of the laws of the country of his adoption, was advised to select Mr. SELWYN to assist him in his studies. He left several sons. The elder died not long after his elevation, two years ago, to the high position of Lord Justice of Appeal in Chancery. The Bishop is now sixty-five years of age, and has, from the days when he was distinguished as a member of the Eton Eight, been conspicuous as an athlete.

A regular European settlement in New-Zealand only dates from the year 1840. Excepting in the solitary instance of an English sailor, the sole survivor of a shipwrecked and massacred crew, who lived for some years among the natives, about the year 1807, no white man appears to have lived on the islands from 1772 to 1814. In 1825 a company was formed for the purpose of establishing a settlement; but the management was confided to incompetent hands, and the leader, alarmed by a war-dance performed, there afterward appeared every reason to believe, as a mark of welcome, abandoned his task, after purchasing some land.

In 1840 an expedition, specially promoted by Sir FRANCIS BARING, (afterward Lord NORTHBROOK,) set out under the auspices of EDWARD GIBBON WAKEFIELD, whose name became foremost in connection with emigration schemes. The circumstances of his departure were striking, and in many spectators awakened thoughts of the embarkation of our own "Pilgrim Fathers." It was just two years after the arrival of this expedition at the antipodes that Bishop SELWYN appeared upon the scene of his future labors, and truly never was there a happier instance of the right man in the right place. He soon acquired the language of the natives, and an enormous influence over them. In his yacht the Southern Cross he used to visit, always accompanied by his devoted wife, whom even constant sea-sickness could not keep from his side, not only the three principal islands of the New-Zealand group, but the immense cluster in the Southern Pacific known under the name of Polynesia. Thence he subsequently placed under the control of Bishop PATTESON, his devoted coadjutor, the eldest son of the late eminent Judge Mr. JOHN PATTESON by the sister of Sir JOHN COLERIDGE, the friend and biographer of KEBLE. Bishop SELWYN, from constantly haranguing Maori audiences, and arguing with their Chiefs, has insensibly caught something of the manner and gesture of the native New-Zealand speakers, who excel in oratory, as in almost everything they undertake.

It was at the express desire of the Queen, personally, that he some years ago reluctantly consented—on the occasion of a visit to England—to accept the Bishopric of Lichfield. Various circumstances had come to Her Majesty's knowledge that convinced her that a missionary Bishop was so much needed among the savages at "the black country," which [illegible] recently [illegible] a frightful picture of morals and [illegible] and the [illegible] "[illegible] common and salutary [illegible] the exception." Sketches [illegible] of society in the great iron-working centre.

Since his consecration to Lichfield, the Bishop has done what, indeed, he could not help doing under any circumstances—thrown his whole energies into the good work, and his labors are beginning to tell. A short time since an incident very characteristic of the man occurred. He had announced his intention to preach in a church recently opened in a colliery district. Arriving, he found the edifice crowded with smart ladies and gentlemen, while hundreds of working-men and their wives were assembled around the doors. He sent to beg the outsiders not to go away, and to assure them that he meant them to hear him. When the sermon was to commence his Lordship, instead of ascending the pulpit, proceeded, to the astonishment of the fashionable part of the audience, to the porch, and taking up a position in the midst of the "assembly" addressed them a thrilling discourse. Bishop SELWYN will meet with a hearty greeting from his brother clergymen in this country.

AMUSEMENTS.

ENTRACTS OF THE WEEK AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, whose highly-successful engagement was recorded on Tuesday, has repeated her impersonation in Queen Katharine, at Booth's Theatre, every evening of the week. Miss CUSHMAN's acting on Monday was deserved admiration; we are of opinion, however, that in respect of force, if not of impressiveness, she has been more like her former self since, the opening night than she was on that occasion. "Henry VIII" is announced, we perceive, for continued representation during the coming week, and it will not be surprising if the honored lady, as in the remarkable instance already mentioned, Mr. CHARTERS has gained the favor of the public in a double sense by his enterprise at Wallack, and Mr. WALLACK's Mr. FRANCE meets recognition for improved and artistic representations which, in their respective degree add much to the symmetry of the entertainment. We much admire, indeed, the management upon the very faithful and liberal way in which they have placed "Henry the VIII" upon the stage. The Fifth-avenue Theatre has been filled to overflowing of late. In fact the boxes are bought many days in advance, and there appears no diminution in the desire to see "Divorce." Fresh, sunny and stylish drama do much to help and Mr. DALY's attractive production, and that it suits the taste of his public is a charm in not to be gainsaid. Since "Divorce" has made so decided a hit, there is renewed concern for consanguinity lest the moral tendency of the piece be not sound. But there is enough and to spare of the wisdom and prudence in the various Protestant denominations that find their way to our boards, and it is wholesome and cheering that a native playwright should have the good taste and good feeling to avoid such examples. To-morrow night the Parque Row Troupe open at the Academy. The opera bouffe is "The Daughter of the Regiment," and the cast includes Mme. FARREA-ROSA as Marie, Mr. TOM KARL, the new tenor, as Tonio; Mr. ANDREW COOKE as Sulpice, Mr. ELIZA EVES as Hortensius, Mr. GUSTAVUS HALL as the Corporal, and Mrs. AVERLEY COOKE as the Marchioness. From what we know, and from what we have heard, Donizetti's work should receive at these hands a treatment of rare excellence, and one that will perhaps surpass all previous hits. On Tuesday "Martha" is to be sung, and on Wednesday Miss CLARA DORIA will be heard for the first time, Arline, in "The Bohemian Girl," being the work selected for the occasion. Another event of note, to-morrow, will occur in the due presentation at the Grand Opera House, of Mr. EDMUND FALCONER's new Irish drama of "Hidden Gem." These clever and popular actors, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. FLORENCE, have secured from the author the sole right of production for this play in this country, and will probably find their privilege a valuable one. The attractiveness of the playbill in the shape of "Hidden Gem" has been the most decided feature of the present season in London so nearly from and, assisted by the talents of Mr. and Mrs. FLORENCE, it will have an excellent chance to rival in New-York its long and prosperous run in London. The element of "Humpty Dumpty" at the Olympic is exhausted. The performance is quite likely to have as prolonged a run as its first. "The Queen of New-York" will be acted at Niblo's to-morrow evening, and during the week. It is not a new play, but it is, on the stage, a very attractive one, for it is cleverly constructed, supplied with a tangible story, and full of incidents fitted to startle, and, detaining, to delight the spectator. After the manner in which Mr. KEENE has figured, "The Queen of New-York" might, perhaps, be considered a necessary drama. Mr. FRANK MAYO will, to-morrow, represent Badger.... The production at the Grand Opera House of "Robin Hood," is among the pleasures of a very long programme, promised for Monday's representation. Mr. LAMPRECHT will appear on Monday.... At Wood's Museum Mme. ROSA WESTON performed throughout last week in "La Mendiante".... At the Bowery, Mlle. ROSA, to-morrow, Mlle. WAGNER, in [illegible] behalf for the last time as "Mazeppa".... Mlle. MARIE ALMA gave a concert at Chickering Hall on Friday. She was assisted by Signor LEONI, M. HERMAN GOTSCHALK, Signor FORNETI, Mr. J. H. PATTISON and Miss LOUISE ALLEN, and was blessed to with much pleasure by the cavatina from "Poh Tamquela." As we have already announced, the opera bouffe season, under the management of Mlle. ALMA, will be commenced at Lina Edwin's on Friday next.... The formal announcement in relation to the Mexican concerts appears elsewhere. The first of the series is to occur at Dodworth Hall on Monday, Oct. 16. It is looked forward to with much interest.... The sale of seats for the season of Italian opera at the Academy of Music will open on Thursday next. The central ticket office is to be located in Fourth-avenue, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets, under the Everett House.

BOLTE'S BALLAD CONCERTS.

The sale of tickets for Mr. BOLTE's ballad concerts begins to-morrow. These concerts seem to fail to be extremely attractive, a fact heretofore that Mr. HAMLEY has never appeared in this country, and to hear him sing a ballad is a treat to be remembered for years. The other members of this excellent company are equally good. Mr. COMPTON has a charming tenor voice, and Mr. LUTGEN SLOPER is one of the best of singers. Concerts so attractive have not been offered for the entertainment of the public for many years past.

Domestic Notes.

Mrs. F. S. CHANFRAU is to appear in "Christie Johnstone," in Richmond, on Monday.... Thence Mr. FAYETTE will escort her to Washington.... Mr. EDWIN BOOTH follows STRAKOSCH's Italian Opera Troupe at the Boston Theatre.... With all respect for the critical ability of Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, and with all deference to M. SARASATE's talents as a violinist, we can hardly accept a verdict that M. SARASATE is "superior to M. VIEUXTEMPS, having a more musical touch, and, we think, a better conception of the composition of the [illegible]."

[illegible] Company were last week at Bailey's Opera-house, in Cincinnati.... Mrs. Langtry was last week in Salt Lake City.... A "sudden indisposition" [illegible] Louisville on Monday.... Mr. MARK SMITH was last week at Dr. Burr's Opera-house, in St. Louis; his engagement ended last night.... Mr. THORNE closed last week in Rochester.... Mr. JOHN MCCULLOUGH was last week at the Boston Globe, and the Lydia Thompson troupe were at the Boston Theatre.... The receipts at Pike's Opera-house, in Cincinnati, during Mr. Jarrett's first week, were [illegible].... The Vienna Lady Orchestra was there last week at Musical Fund Hall, in Philadelphia.... Mr. E. L. DAVENPORT was acting at the Chestnut-street Theatre.... Mr. CHARLES HATHWAY was at the Arch-street Theatre.... Miss KATRINA BLANCHARD had a most profitable benefit performance in Milwaukee on last Wednesday week. "Schneider" was the play. Mr. MCKEE RANKIN representing Jack Pepper. A Milwaukee daily paper gives in its critique of the performance a few words of commendation for the "Radical Press," [illegible] during the intermission, and notes that "its main features are a break, turning into a delicious giddy [illegible], followed by a mounted movement."..... Friday Mr. LINGARD and his company were in Troy.... The Albany Daily Advertiser prints in its issue of Sept. 30 the announcement appended: "Mr. LAWRENCE BARRETT will not appear tonight, as previously announced. The company with which he was expected has been broken up, the manager losing several thousand dollars on his theatrical tour."..... A Philadelphia paper makes known that "Mr. THORNE will visit the city Friday for the special purpose of witnessing the unrivaled personation of Mr. E. L. DAVENPORT in the character of Sir Pertinax."

"THE SEA-SERPENT" IS NEVADA.

The Virginia City (Nevada) Territorial Enterprise supplies the following report of affairs at the local Grand Opera-house. In the issue of Sept. 24 the writer says: "The great wild-cat and ball-dog fight came off at the Opera-house last night, according to programme, and was witnessed by a full and excited house, composed mostly of men, but a few of the sterner sex"—when it comes to cat fighting—were present. There was ringed up on the stage a large cage, twelve feet wide, ten feet deep, and ten feet high; the front and five feet of either side constituted of cast iron bars. Toward the last of the day, placed in it to perfectly light up the interior, were eight gas jets. All being in readiness, fight No. 1 took place. The smallest cat was let into the den, and soon after Mr. GAY's large white bull-dog, Hero, more proved himself a hero indeed in this instance. He went after that cat "thar and then." The cat stood his first charge, and then began to wheel to get in a flank movement. But Hero, with a wonderful circle, headed her off, and then, as

AMERICAN INSTITUTE.

The Fair on Saturday Nights.

The American Institute Fair is always a popular evening resort, but on Saturdays the usual crowd is augmented until even the vast space inclosed by the Hall becomes a dense mass of human beings. On Saturday evenings generally the heads of the family visit the Fair, but the younger members, by a sort of unwritten right, always demand to be taken too, and it is a pleasant sight to look upon as the little ones wonder beneath the flaming lights, stop to wonder at the man making portmanteaus, or the garment of young ladies turning out all sorts of braids and fringes, or gaze at the gold-fish in the big fountain, and then trot off to be terribly frightened by the big steam-engines, with their whirring wheels, while papa and mamma come slowly up behind, warning their little people now and again, that little hands must not touch the thousand tempting objects spread before them. There are few seats in the vast space covered by the Hall, and consequently people must keep moving. This is no hardship, however, for one can scarcely look around without finding some strange, tempting or look upon, something which irresistably attracts the steps lutherward. Watching the crowd as it enters the building, we see some of its members pause for a moment to look at the tempting display of watches and jewelry in the cases on the right, then the vestibule is passed, and the whole vast building, with its tastefully disposed lights, is in full view. Here the crowd disperses. Some, as in life, go ahead, while others prefer to branch off along the corridors, where, indeed, the most interesting objects are to be seen, and others desirous of being as high in the world as possible, make at once for the stairways and the art gallery above. About 9 o'clock the music commences, and very good music it is, and for an hour longer visitors wander round, until the signal for closing is given, and then the outward move commences. In a quarter of an hour the Hall is cleared, the lights and its thousand objects of interest are left to the care of its firemen and watchmen.

The Pennsylvania War Claims—The Arrest of George O. Evans.

GEORGE O. EVANS, recently arrested on a requisition of the Governor of Pennsylvania, charged with the embezzlement of $221,045 81 of the State funds, was yesterday up before Judge McCUNN, in Superior Court, Special Term, and a motion made for his discharge on a writ of habeas corpus. It will be recollected that under authority of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, EVANS was appointed a special agent for obtaining from the United States the reimbursement of money expended during the war, amounting in all to $3,115,419 32. The act of the Legislature fixed the amount of compensation at not more than ten per cent., while on the part of Mr. Evans it is claimed that his commission was fixed by an agreement with the Governor at ten per cent. on the full amount of the claims, and that exactly that agreement he had paid over to the State all the money he had received, less his commissions.

The discharge of Mr. EVANS was rested on the ground that the Court could not go behind the requisition, it being on its face regular, and inquire as to the guilt of the accused; that the question of compensation was not definitely fixed by law; that $2,000,000, claimed to have been collected and for which commissions were charged, was merely an offset to claims which the United States had against the State of Pennsylvania.

Counsel for Mr. Evans claimed that in any case the facts did not show a case of embezzlement, and that in fact the whole matter was the result of a difference in politics.

Judge McCUNN took the papers and reserved his decision.

Death in a Police Cell—A Strange Suicide.

Friday afternoon a man supposed to be insensible from intoxication was found in Greenwich-avenue and taken to the Ninth Precinct Station-house, where he was locked up. At 1 o'clock yesterday morning he was found dead in his cell, and Coroner HERMAN was summoned to investigate the matter. From the evidence taken it was shown that deceased was Mr. SALMON DUTTON, a keeper at the United States Marshal's office, and who boarded at No. 34 Greenwich-avenue, so that he had been on the United States Marshal's almost from his own door-step. It was also shown that he had some family difficulties, and that after being locked up he vomited frequently. Dr. JOHN BEACH made a post-mortem examination, which proved that death had been caused by some corrosive poison, and upon these facts a verdict of suicide by poison was rendered. The testimony of the door-man disclosed that he was visited frequently by the officers during the night; but there was no evidence that the officers in charge of the house summoned any physician to attend him. It was generally supposed that he was only intoxicated, and the impression was confirmed by the fact that when he was found in the street some citizen told the officer that he had been on a spree.

The term of the Civil Courts for October commences to-morrow, and with it begins the hard labor of Judges and lawyers for the Fall and Winter months. The following is the assignment of Judges to preside in the various branches:

The Grand Central Railroad Depot, Harlem Railroad.

Trains will commence running to and from the Grand Central Railroad Depot, in Fourth-avenue, on Monday, Oct. 2; New-Haven Railroad trains on the 16th inst., and the Central and Hudson River Railroad trains on the 23d inst. It is believed that this arrangement will prevent any confusion which might be caused by having the cars of the various lines start on the same day. When trains depart from and arrive at this depot they will not be allowed to run within a mile of each other, and their movements between the City and Spuyten Duyvil Railroad junction will be regulated by a new system of electrical signals now being arranged. Mr. JOSEPH H. FRANKLIN, a popular conductor on the New-Haven Railroad for a period of twenty years, has been appointed depot-master on behalf of the New-Haven Railroad Company, and the arrival and departure of all trains of that road will be under his control.

A Westchester County Tragedy.

An inquest was held at Peekskill on Thursday, on the body of JOSEPHA CASSELL, aged fifteen years, who died from the effects of a dose of arsenic, taken for the purpose of self-destruction. It was shown that the deceased had recently cohabited with her mistress' husband, and had thereby occasioned trouble and disgrace to the family, and on having been threatened with punishment by her mother, took the fatal dose. The deceased had purchased the poison at the store of SELLECK & LANE, and Mr. SELLECK, on being examined, testified that the firm sold poisons to anybody who called for them and had money to pay for the same, for which course they were severely censured by the jury.

CONSECRATION OF ST. JOHN'S.

Brilliant Opening of a Beautiful Church in Clifton, Staten Island.

The consecration of St. John's Episcopal Church in the beautiful little town of Clifton, Staten Island, was an unusually brilliant affair. Many things tended to this; it above the joy of with ceremonials. There was an unusual century of high church dignitaries, who were in town waiting for the General Convention. There were also many distinguished clergymen of the State who had attended the Diocesan Convention and had remained in the City for the purpose of taking part in the service so dear to the hearts of Christian people. Besides this concurrence of preachers, there was a strong interest attached to the church itself, because it was the work of a celebrated architect, Mr. GILMAN, who built the Equitable, and also because it was said to strongly resemble that famous church of Stratford-on-Avon, which holds the only authentic bust of WM. SHAKESPEARE. And during the progress of its erection many whispers had gone forth of its singularity and its beauty. Mr. JOHN APPLETON, of the great publishing house, was known not only to have contributed largely, but to have been lavish of presentations of beautiful things. Other gentlemen had not been behind hand. Four individuals had given memorial stained windows, the Sisters of the parish had vowed their fingers, to the bone in supplying manners, altar-cloths, &c., the young people of both sexes had united their funds and purchased one bell of the chime of four, the Sunday-school had purchased another, and the private generosity of two individuals had completed the set. Never had greater unanimity been seen in any parish. From the moment that the school stone had been laid, in October, 1868, until yesterday, when the edifice was finished, there had been no hitch in the proceedings. Whatever the architect, Mr. GILMAN, had required during that time, the energy of Dr. ECCLESTON, the rector, and of the Building Committee, Messrs. JOHN APPLETON, J. LEAVCRAFT, J. H. VANDERBILT, GEO. A. LEAVITT, and GEO. S. SCOFIELD, had amply supplied. And on the moment of completion the number of the congregation and parishioners was greatly increased by the intelligence that no less than five Bishops would grace the opening service.

At the hour of 11 A. M. the ceremonial began by a procession of the clergymen present, preceded by the Building Committee, of whom Dr. ECCLESTON, the rector, had chosen Mr. Leavitt and Mr. Scofield, the two Wardens, on either side, giving place to the ministers, who ranged themselves on each side of the chancel, the Bishops seating themselves within the communion railing. The following clergymen were present: Bishop POTTER, of New-York; Bishop WILMER, of Alabama; Bishop BEDELL, of Georgia; Bishop QUINTARD, of Tennessee; Bishop CLARKE, of Rhode Island; Dr. HALLECK, of New-York; Dr. GODDARD, of St. Andrew's, Richmond, Staten Island; Dr. GEO. D. WILDE, of Riverdale; Dr. SPENCER, of New-York; Dr. BEACHCROFT, who officiated as clerical master of the ceremonies; Dr. GUILBERT, of New-York; Dr. PUNNETT, of St. Paul's, Tompkinsville, Staten Island; Dr. ECCLESTON, the rector, and Dr. JEWETT, of New-York.

The service which was quite lengthy was participated in by almost all of these gentlemen; the consecration was performed by Dr. POTTER, the Bishop of New-York; the sermon was preached by Dr. CLARK, Bishop of Rhode Island, and the communion was delivered by Bishop POTTER, assisted by Bishops QUINTARD and BEDELL. During the service the Benedicite and Te Deum Laudamus were performed in an admirable manner by the quartet, Miss WERNER, soprano; Miss GRIFFITH, contralto; Mr. WARNER, tenor, and Mr. E. WARNER, bass. They were assisted by the quartet from Trinity Church, Newark, consisting of Miss MERRITT, soprano; Miss HILBERT, contralto; Mr. BRIGGS, tenor, and Mr. MERAT, bass. During the offertory Miss MEHTZ sang a solo from an adaptation of a mass by GALLS, in the most admirable manner, with a power and feeling which must have impressed every one. The organ was played by Mr. BIGHOPE.

During the administration of the Lord's Supper the greatest interest in the congregation wandered about the exterior of the church, admiring it from every possible point of view. To New-Yorkers the edifice was particularly attractive, because as the architect was not cramped for room he had been enabled to reproduce the cruciform structure which was, in the early church, considered a sine qua non. A church without transepts and chancel was deemed no more entitled to be called a church at all. But the conditions under which New-York churches are built will not permit these. Yet half the beauty of the Gothic church lies in these and in the deep shadows which they throw over the central mass of the church. This was forcibly exemplified yesterday, in the Church of St. John's, for the sun was shining brightly, and the effect of the broad lines of shading from the transepts was noticed by every one. The exact and beautiful proportion of the chancel to the nave and the transepts was also a matter of admiring comment. The broad flow lower which springs from the crux, or point of union of the nave, chancel and transepts was also highly praised. But the spire surmounting this tower was sternly criticised. It was admitted that its hexagonal lines were very symmetrical, and its ornamentation chaste and in perfect harmony with the other details. But its material was wood, covered with zinc painted to look like stone, and it rose directly from the square tower without any intermediate forms by which the change from a square to a hexagonal cone might have been softened. This was considered a slight blemish. The latter objection may be met, but the first seems serious, since the contrast between the spire and the amorphous granite of the tower is very glaring. This stone has been used throughout the building and presents a dull tone of color, being of a pinkish hue, mingled with green, gray and green. The stone, however, contains iron, and will undergo some changes of color that will startle the good people of Clifton. It is, however, the intention to cover the exterior with ivy, and for this cause the stones were roughly hewn, and not smooth-finished except for the voussoirs of the arches of the windows and porches. These are all equilateral in shape, in the pointed style, except those arches in the windows of the tower.

In the interior, the pillars which support the clerestory are very slender and symmetrical. They have been covered with Portland cement, which gives them a uniform dull gray color, rather lighter in effect, and sadly wanting in color. The capitals are poetry, and the moulding of the arches very effective. The large windows of the clerestory above give plenty of light, and are unusually lofty, from the peculiar and admirable arrangement of the ceiling, which is open timbered, its unusual height being supported by cross-tie beams. The stained-glass windows below are of intrinsic beauty in shape and in the stone tracery, which is beautifully foliated. The colors, however, are very faint, and it is only when the observer comes close to them that he can see how exquisitely perfect is the drawing and the expression of the faces. This poverty of color proceeds from the misapprehension of the English furnishers, Messrs. HEATON, BUTLER, and BAYNE, of London, who, accustomed to the most climate and duller hues of their island, have not taken into account the conditions which surround an American church. They have no idea how deep are the blue skies, and how motionless the golden clouds of American heavens; nor can they imagine the superb colors which deck the dying foliage of our forests in the Fall. It is for this same reason that American ladies who are dressed to perfection in their own country seem too gaudy and too fond of pronounced tints under the sombre skies of European lands. The windows furnished from Orange, N. J., are not guilty of this fault, and there is one in particular in the south transept and south aisle which is equal in design and drawing to the London work, and far superior in color. The chancel arch is bold and beautiful. It is equilateral and of the true pointed style of the best mediæval ecclesiastical period. Above the arch is a fresco of very well executed. The chancel is highly decorated with fresco work also, but the artist, with peculiar heedlessness, has introduced everywhere the design of the lotus, the peculiar emblem of Krishna and Osiris.

When the church had been sufficiently examined the leading guests were invited to the rectory, where a superb collation awaited them, to which they did ample justice.

BASE-BALL.

Mutual vs. Star.

The first game this season, between these clubs, was played yesterday, on the Capitoline Grounds, and though the Stars had their full nine out, and the Mutuals played without WOLTERS, and with but eight men, the Stars fielded so poorly, in a majority of their innings, that the Mutuals found it a comparatively easy task to defeat them, as will be seen by the appended score. The Mutuals play the Haymakers a "reconciliation game" on Monday, on the Union Grounds, and on Tuesday they go to the Fashion Course, to play the Eckfords. The following is the score:

SATURDAY, Sept. 30—P. M.

The City Banks are rapidly getting into line with their lawful Money basis. On the weekly return they add $3,647,400 to the surplus, in the aggregate, over the required 25 ₩ cent., as compared with last week. The gain in Gold Notes is $3,536,200; the loss in Greenbacks, $3,156,000; the decrease in Deposits, $8,090,400, and the increase in Circulation $32,600. The contraction in Loans is $7,808,600. The alternation in Gold and Greenbacks is the result of the operations of the Treasury of the close of the previous week. For the week just closed the Treasury Office bought $5,000,000 United States 5-20s, and sold $2,000,000 Gold. It received $3,418,000 in Gold for Customs.

The sales of Gold for the day were the same as on Friday, 114⅝@114⅞, but the Cash Gold was scarcer, and a sixteenth of one ₩ cent. was paid for its use until Monday.

Money closed at 7 ₩ cent. on call loan and on Merchant paper. Early in the day the Brokers borrowed on call loan at 6 ₩ cent., with exceptions at 5 ₩ cent. The demand was more active at the close, when 7 ₩ cent. was paid.

The Stock Exchange was active on the Railways and Miscellaneous Stocks, and the temper of the market decidedly bullish, as foreshadowed on Friday Afternoon. A large business was done in Erie and most of the Western Roads, with a continued firm feeling in New-York Central, New-Jersey Central and Delaware and Lackawanna. The Public Funds were firm on a very moderate offering, and so were the Pacific Mortgages, Centrals closing 102½ ₩ cent. After the late Boards the following quotations were made as compared with Friday night. There was rather less spirit in the speculative Stocks than in the foreneon. The turn in the supply of Cash Gold added to the weakness of Exchange, and 60 days' London was not much over 108 ₩ cent. on actual Cash transactions, and short sight 109 ₩ cent.
